

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

STUDIES IN HISTORY ECONOMICS AND PUBLIC LAW

EDITED BY
THE FACULTY OF POLITICAL SCIENCE
OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

VOLUME NINETY-THREE

New York
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY
LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., AGENTS
LONDON: P. S. KING & SON, LTD.
1920-1921

191
191
191

70 1/2
11/10/11

CONTENTS

	PAGE
1. THE ENGLISH REFORM BILL OF 1867— Joseph H. Park, Ph.D.	I
2. THE POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES AS REGARDS INTERVEN- TION— Charles E. Martin, Ph.D.	287

448471

1

THE ENGLISH REFORM BILL OF 1867

STUDIES IN HISTORY, ECONOMICS AND PUBLIC LAW

EDITED BY THE FACULTY OF POLITICAL SCIENCE
OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

Volume XCIII]

[Number 1

Whole Number 210

THE ENGLISH REFORM BILL OF 1867

BY

JOSEPH H. PARK, Ph.D.

Instructor in History at New York University

New York
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY
LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., AGENTS
LONDON: P. S. KING & SON, LTD.

1920

THE NEW AMERICAN

COPYRIGHT, 1920
BY JOSEPH H. PARK

To MY UNCLE
J. C. WILLEVER

PREFACE

THERE is no more important event connected with the story of the development of democracy in England than the passage of the Representation of the People Act of 1867. It is not unfitting, therefore, that attention should be paid to the circumstances under which the measure was carried.

The present study is an attempt not only to tell the history of great party leaders and political cliques of the period but also to calculate the extent to which England reacted to the esprit du siècle after the triumph of the democratic cause in the American Civil War and more especially to trace the influence of the political agitation of those social classes not within "the pale of the Constitution" during a season of stress. A recital of facts proving that the urban working class was advancing in knowledge does not of itself explain why the working class was admitted to a share of England's government, else the arguments brought forward by the friends of Reform in 1866 would have accomplished the passage of the bill of that year. Nor yet was it mob violence in 1866-1867 which was effective, for the lower classes displayed more violence in 1832 and during the Chartist movement than in the 'sixties and did not attain success. But as in 1828 O'Connell, by displaying through his remarkable control of the Catholic Associations that he had power over those capable of immoderate action, caused a worried Parliament to legislate, so in 1866-1867 middle-class leaders of workingmen, cooperating with organizations such as the Reform League and the trade unions, obtained results by stating that their well-planned parades and quietly-conducted Reform meetings were but

"dress rehearsals" for more dramatic scenes in case demands were not granted. Political leaders, recognizing that action must be taken by one party or the other, bid for popular support. England started on the road to democracy although that road was not to broaden out to Mr. Lowe's dreaded "wide plain" until other measures, notably among them the acts of 1884-1885 and 1918, had been passed.

Acknowledgment is made by the author of a very free use of certain secondary works although material for the survey is based in the main upon newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets. Frequent notation will show the service to which Lord Morley's Life of Gladstone, Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's Life of John Bright, and the excellent biography of Disraeli by Monypenny and Buckle have been put. Statistics concerning the electoral system in Mr. Charles Seymour's Electoral Reform in England and Wales have been regarded as authoritative. The work of writers in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society has proved very helpful indeed. And much inspiration has come from Mr. J. Holland Rose's The Rise of Democracy, Mr. Gilbert Slater's The Making of Modern England, and Mr. Preston Slosson's The Decline of the Chartist Movement.

The writer wishes to acknowledge the kind interest of Professor James T. Shotwell under whose general supervision this monograph was started. He is indebted to Professor Carlton J. H. Hayes for whose encouragement, advice, and criticism he is deeply grateful. And he is under obligation to Professor Robert L. Schuyler for criticizing the manuscript and to Professor Edwin R. A. Seligman for the use of pamphlets in his private library. Mr. Clinton Mindil of New York University and Miss Isabel McKenzie have given helpful suggestions. It seems fair to state that this thesis was practically finished when the writer was called into military service on March 5, 1918, and was therefore obliged to defer its publication.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
PREFACE	7

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTION

The place of the Reform bill of 1832 in English history.	13
The defects of the bill in the provisions concerning redistribution.	13
Increase of anomalies after 1832	14
The defects of the bill in the enfranchising clauses	17
Character of the measures passed by Parliament after 1832	18
Protests against the existing system by the Chartists.	22
Diminution of agitation during the prosperous years succeeding 1848	23
Activity of the official class in Reform in the period of prosperity.	25
Effects of events abroad on English democratic development	29
In France	29
In Germany	31
In Italy	33
In America.	38

CHAPTER II

THE CONDITION OF THE WORKING CLASS IN THE 'SIXTIES

The relation between economic pressure and political agitation	51
Favorable conditions of the early 'sixties.	51
Encouraging reports of 1865.	52
Exceptions to general prosperity	53
Contrast presented by 1866 and 1867 to preceding years	57
The poor harvests.	57
Financial failures	58
Effect of the panic upon 1866 and 1867	60
Condition of the leading trades	63
Influence of other troublesome events	64
The statistician's data relative to conditions of the working class	65

	PAGE
On prices, retail and wholesale	66
On wages.	70
On unemployment	74
Current opinions upon the economic situation in 1866 and 1867 . .	78
Clamor for Reform in the period of stress	80

CHAPTER III

THE POPULAR ATTITUDE TOWARD REFORM

Little demand for Reform in the early 'sixties	87
Purpose of Reform meetings held before the election of 1865 . . .	89
The formation of the Reform League	89
The election of 1865 favorable to Palmerston	91
Formation of the Russell-Gladstone ministry.	92
Insufficient popular interest in Reform during latter half of 1865 and first half of 1866 to effect Parliament.	93
No economic pressure to cause political agitation.	99
Increasing agitation during the latter half of 1866	100
Influence of Lowe's speeches	100
The Hyde Park incident	102
Increasing influence of the Reform League	105
The great demonstrations during the autumn of 1866	106
Trade unions an important factor in agitation	114
Evidence of great interest in the Reform question by the beginning of 1867	117
Influence of agitators upon the terms of the Reform bill	123
Anticipated results of Parliamentary Reform	130
Partial abolition of class government.	131
Solution of pressing social questions	131
Relief from economic pressure.	132
Summary.	133

CHAPTER IV

THE OFFICIAL ATTITUDE TOWARD REFORM

Indifference of both parties to Reform in the early 'sixties	135
Hope of Reformers in the Russell-Gladstone ministry.	136
Attitude of Gladstone toward the Reform question	137
Indifference of the conservative element in the Liberal party . .	138
Interest of the radical element in Reform	138
Introduction of a franchise bill in March, 1866	139
Attitude of the House toward the measure	144

	PAGE
The Adullamites	147
Debates on the second reading.	148
A redistribution bill added.	153
The bill in committee	158
Defeat of the Government on the basis of the borough franchise qualification.	159
Opposition of Parliament to Reform apparent	160
Arguments against the bill itself.	160
Arguments against the existing Government dealing with the question	164
Arguments against democratic tendencies	164
Refutations of the Government's arguments	172
Defensive attitude of the Liberals	172
Belief of the working class in the hostility of Parliament to change	184

CHAPTER V

DISRAELI'S SUCCESS WITH REFORM IN 1867

Resignation of the Russell-Gladstone ministry, June, 1866	185
Formation of the Derby-Disraeli ministry	187
The indifference of the new ministry toward Reform.	189
Their opinions on the subject changed by popular activity	190
Reform brought before Parliament by resolutions	192
The Ten-Minutes "bill"	193
Resignations from the cabinet.	199
Introduction of a more extensive measure	200
Attitude of Gladstone and Bright toward the new measure	201
Conciliatory speech by Disraeli	203
Tea-room schism of Liberal members	206
The bill in committee	207
Amendment practically conceding household suffrage in boroughs adopted.	210
Numbers admitted by amendment and by bill	211
Redistribution	213
Novel amendments proposed during the passage of the bill	214
The bill in the House of Lords	219
Discussion of the authorship of the Act of 1867.	221
The influence of Gladstone.	221
The influence of Bright	225
The influence of Disraeli	227
The influence of popular opinion.	232
Disraeli's motive in guiding the bill through Parliament	234
Disraeli's policy supported by the Conservative party.	244

CHAPTER VI

CONCLUSION

The effect of Disraeli's success with Reform upon the fortunes of his party	246
The impossibility of calculating the influence of Disraeli's policy immediately because of the Irish question	247
The election of 1868 favorable to the Liberals	252
Success of Disraeli's move of 1867 apparent at a later period	254
Effect of the second Reform Act upon the position of the working-men in the state	257
Problems to democratic advance after 1867.	258
Reform measures for Scotland and Ireland.	258
Change in the registration system	260
The problem of corrupt practices	262
The further extension of the suffrage in the counties	264
The need of redistribution	265
Comparatively little attention given to the working class immediately after 1867.	268
Passage of factory legislation	269
The Education Bill of 1870	271
Legislation on trade unions	272
Formation of the Labor party	274
The socialization of politics in the twentieth century	275
BIBLIOGRAPHY	276
INDEX	283

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTION

THE Reform bill of 1832¹—the Great Reform bill—has merited much attention and praise, especially from those students who have desired to trace the rise of democracy in England. But, as is well known, the measure is not the one which made England democratic, and was not without its defects: both in the provisions concerning redistribution and in those pertaining to the enlargement of the franchise it was open to the attacks of the Radicals and of the working class.

Although some of the grossest anomalies of the period preceding 1832 were removed by its redistribution clauses, there had been no pretence of adopting the principle of equal electoral districts. Many of the smaller boroughs still were given the same political influence as the larger ones. And, because of the great influence of property, not a few of them fell under the power of the property-owning class to such an extent that they approached the character of those boroughs in which direct nomination had formerly prevailed.² Indeed, a list of over forty was made out with the name of the patron of each.³ Moreover, the transfer of part of the representation of those boroughs which had been disfranchised, to the counties where the influence of the landlord was predominant, gave power to property and was displeasing to the Radicals.¹

¹ 2 and 3 William IV, c. 45, 65, 88 (including the measures for Scotland and Ireland).

² Vide the speech of Lord John Russell, Annual Register, vol. xciv, p. 18.

³ G. Lowes Dickinson, The Development of Parliament during the Nineteenth Century (London, 1895), chap. ii, gives a long description of anomalies of distribution after 1832.

And the anomalies which were bad enough in the 'thirties became greater and greater as the years went by and the Industrial Revolution wrought its changes. Those cities which grew very rapidly during the thirty years following 1832 retained the old number of representatives in Parliament—as did also those towns and districts which showed little increase in population and wealth. Statistics depict an England becoming half again as populous during this period; they tell of the increasing crowds of the cities—of the number of persons engaged in manufactures mounting during the twenty years between 1841 and 1861 from 1,789,000 to 3,117,000, in commerce from 499,000 to 1,110,000, in mines from 210,000 to 425,000, in building from 353,000 to 539,000; they tell, on the other hand, of a relative decline in agriculture wherein the recorded increase of persons engaged is only from 1,297,000 to 1,700,000.² The industrial map of England was showing great changes; many a Silas Marner found that factories had taken the place of the familiar Lantern Yard. If the new situation were not met by a new redistribution bill, the anomalies of the later nineteenth century would be as great as they had been at the beginning of that century. It is not surprising, therefore, to find the pamphleteers and the magazine writers discussing the subject. The Westminster Review declared in 1865 that it was impossible upon any rational principle to contend that Honiton with a population of 3300 ought to have—as it then had—as many members as Liverpool or Glasgow with half a million of people and incalculable wealth of commerce.¹ In Macmillan's it was said that a majority of the House of Commons consisting of 328 members, all of whom (except 11) represented borough constituencies of the smaller class in England (including Wales) and Scotland, was returned by 250,291 electors, or about one-fifth of the whole electoral body; while about the same number of electors (244,459) in the larger boroughs returned only thirty-six members or about one-eighteenth of the whole House;² in the Fortnightly Review it was asserted that such an unequal and anomalous system of representation as was then existing in England, if proposed to a new community by any statesman, would be considered absurd.³ To the writer in the latter magazine the fact was startling that Rutland with 1,772 electors on the roll should return as many members as the West Riding of Yorkshire, with 40,476, and that the little town of Knaresborough with 271, and Thetford with 223 electors, should be as largely represented as the great cities of Birmingham, Liverpool and Manchester, with constituencies of from 15,000 to 22,000. The result of the whole system was that one-third of the constituents sent two-thirds of the Parliamentary representatives for all Great Britain and Ireland, and what great practical good—it was asked—could spring from a system so theoretically unjust! Indeed, a person of a mathematical turn of mind may show anomalies at will from the nicely constructed tables of the pamphleteers;⁴ and he may find some foundation for their statements that when the enormous increase of population and the still greater increase in the value of property were

¹ J. H. Rose, The Rise of Democracy (London, 1897), p. 49.

² M. G. Mulhall, The Dictionary of Statistics (London, 1899), pp. 420 and 421.

¹ Westminster Review, April, 1865, p. 512.

² Macmillan's, January, 1866, p. 260, article by Lord Hobart.

³ Fortnightly Review, vol. iv, p. 430, article by Edward Wilson.

⁴ Vide, for instance, The Reform Problem by "Political Euclid," (London, 1866).

taken into consideration, the anomalies of the existing system of representation were almost as great as those that existed prior to 1832.¹ That Parliament was well aware of the main facts of the case may be seen from an extract from Mr. Laing's speech before the House of Commons given shortly after the introduction of the 1866 Reform bill:

He found a number of boroughs—forty—in which the population was under 7,000; the number of electors averaging 400 in each; those forty boroughs, therefore, with a united population of 200,000, and an aggregate number of voters of 16,000, returned sixty-four Members to that House. Contrast that with the single county of Lanarkshire, with a population of 530,000 by the last census—more than that of the whole forty boroughs united—and returning only one Member to Parliament . . . Dundee, the capital of a staple branch of industry with a population approaching 100,000, had a single Member—exactly one-sixty-fourth of the representation enjoyed by the forty small boroughs, whose united population only doubled that of Dundee. Glasgow, again, with a population of about half a million, and more than 20,000 electors, only returned two representatives as against the sixty-four returned by these small boroughs. But the case for redistribution became even stronger if the table of boroughs was examined with an eye to the increase or diminution which had taken place in the population of the large towns and small boroughs since 1832. In eighteen boroughs, returning twenty-three Members, the population had actually diminished since that date, whilst in the eleven largest manufacturing towns in the North, the number of £10 householders in the same period had increased by 178 per cent. The contrast was not merely remarkable as regarded the population relatively to the Members; but while, on the one side, they had a set of small boroughs stationary or declining in population, on the other they had a number of large towns rising rapidly into importance, with electors in each of those towns increasing more rapidly than the electors in all the small boroughs put together; and yet they commanded no adequate proportion of the representation.¹

¹*Ibid.*, p. 5.

But justly complained of as were those defects, already mentioned, of the great Reform bill, a much greater cause for complaint was found in its enfranchising clauses. Before 1832 the landed and commercial classes had been the rulers of England. Both the manufacturing class and the working class expressed, during the years immediately preceding the passage of the bill, their opposition to the existing situation. Francis Place, a Radical, who had secured partial liberty for trade unions in 1824, became influential in the formation of a National Political Union (October, 1831), designed to give cohesion to the provincial bodies which were interested in Reform, and to unite the middle and laboring classes in common political action.² His activity and the agitation of the working class were important factors in causing the bill to be passed.³ But the measure gave the franchise to only those occupiers of premises of the clear yearly value of not less than £10 in the boroughs and those copyholders and leaseholders of land worth £10 a year, and tenants-at-will of lands worth £50 a year in the counties.⁴ Such provisions meant that the industrial middle class was to be added to the rulers of the country and that the working class had been given nothing. To the latter it soon became patent that Lord John Russell, important leader

¹ Hansard, third series, vol. clxxxii (March 12, 1866), pp. 78 and 79.

² Rose, op. cit., pp. 46 and 47.

³ Cf. Gilbert Slater, The Making of Modern England, new revised edition (Boston, 1915), pp. 94-97.

⁴ In boroughs resident freemen created before 1831 kept their vote and in the counties the forty-shilling freehold qualification was retained.

of the Whigs, did not intend to have any further extension of the franchise after the passage of the Reform bill and that both those Parliamentary leaders who had supported and those who had opposed the measure were alike determined to go no further, but to use their best endeavors "to preserve the renovated constitution, entire and unimpaired."¹ There had been ushered in the Victorian compromise, described by Chesterton as "the decision of the middle classes to employ their new wealth in backing up a sort of aristocratical compromise, and not . . . insisting on a clean sweep and a clear democratic programme."² Doomed to disappointment, therefore, was any hope of betterment of social conditions through the exercise of the franchise that the working class and the Radical Reformers and Radical Clubs had in mind when they demanded universal suffrage, vote by ballot, short Parliaments, and the abolition of the property qualification for members of Parliament. The House of Commons was still to remain the "comfortable rich man's club,"³ caring too much for the interests it represented.

Hence it happened that any alliance between the Whigs, the Radicals and the working classes could not be formed permanently when the latter two groups saw the Whigs play the part of Tories.⁴ Whig ministries found it expedient to do nothing to protect trade-union organizations or cooperative societies. "Taxes on knowledge" were allowed to continue, an obstacle to efforts on the part of the workingman to gain opportunities for social, mental and

¹ Speech of Lord John Russell, Hansard, third series, vol. xiii, p. 462.

² G. K. Chesterton, The Victorian Age in Literature (London, 1913), p. 30.

³ So called by Westminster Review, January, 1867, p. 185.

⁴ Rose, op. cit., pp. 61 and 62.

moral improvement. The "Moral-force" Chartists might well protest.

It can be pointed out, of course, that something was done for the working class. The famous Factory Act of 1833¹—in the opinion of a section of England's representatives, the factory owners as typified by John Bright, "one of the worst measures ever passed in the shape of an Act of the legislature"—was put through by the aid of Tories deeply moved by the existing conditions in the factories and not unmindful of an opportunity to injure the interests of the manufacturing capitalists.² The Tory Lord Ashley succeeded in carrying the Mines and Collieries Act³ of 1842 by which some of the evils connected with the employment of women and children in mines were remedied. The same reformer was able to carry an act in 1844⁴ which bettered the condition of young persons and women in factories, and in 1847 the Ten Hours Act⁵ (not, however, through any aid rendered by John Bright and the Radicals). Moreover, the factory acts were extended during the years 1845 to 1861 to industries allied to textiles, and during the 'sixties to non-textile factories and workshops.⁶ But, in contrast to the little done, there was much more left undone. The Fortnightly Review declaimed against this lack of legislation on important topics:

¹ 3 and 4 William IV, c. 103.

² George C. Brodrick and J. K. Fotheringham in The Political History of England (edited by William Hunt and R. L. Poole), vol. xi, p. 327, and Arnold Toynbee, Lectures on the Industrial Revolution, third impression (London, 1913), pp. 231 and 232.

³ 5 and 6 Vict., c. 99.

⁴ 7 and 8 Vict., c. 15.

⁵ 10 and 11 Vict., c. 29.

⁶ B. L. Hutchins and A. Harrison, A History of Factory Legislation, second edition revised (London, 1911), chap. vii and viii.

The doctrine of laissez faire in such matters may be philosophical, but it may also be the result of cowardice, selfishness, and stupidity; and there is an amusing inconsistency in the manner in which men will tell you almost in the same breath that Parliament can do little or nothing for the welfare of the masses of the people, and then quote some recent Act as indicative of the profound consideration of the same Parliament for their welfare.¹

Much, too, which was done was regarded as having been done for self-interest. The new Poor Law of 1834,² opposed by Cobbett and Disraeli, who believed it bore "fearful tidings for the poor,"³ cut down the rates for the property owner; it did little for the destitute who had not been trained to care for themselves, and when the measure was vigorously enforced by the commissioners with little disposition to allow any temporary relaxation of the system, and during a time of poor harvests, the suffering was great, and the cry arose: "Let us end the power of the Whigs. Vote for the Tories in preference to the Whigs, the authors of the accursed Poor law."⁴ The exclusion of all councillors who did not possess a certain amount of real or personal property, from the elective town councils had caused the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835⁵ to appear as another middle-class measure.⁶ And again, later—in 1846—a section of the Whigs was anxious to have the corn laws repealed, influenced greatly, doubtless, by the existing distress and by the chance, perhaps, to injure land-owners (many of

¹ Fortnightly Review, vol. iv, p. 425.

² 4 and 5 William IV, c. 76.

³ William F. Monypenny, The Life of Benjamin Disraeli, 4 vols. (New York, 1910-16), vol. i, p. 374.

⁴ Rose, op. cit., p. 61, citing an election speech of 1841 at Leicester.

⁵ 5 and 6 William IV, c. 76.

⁶ Rose, op. cit., p. 61.

whom were Tories), and also touched by the thought of cheap bread and low wages. Thomas Cooper, in The Life, Written by Himself, gives a speech of a Chartist leader in which the hearers are earnestly exhorted not to be led away from their adherence to the People's Charter by the corn-law repealers; not that the corn-law repeal was wrong but when we get the charter, we will repeal the Corn Laws and all other bad laws. But if you give up your agitation for the Charter to help the Free Traders, they will not help you to get the Charter. Do not be deceived by the middle classes again. You helped them to get their votes—you swelled their cry of "The bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill!" But where are the fine promises they made you? Gone to the winds! They said when they had gotten their votes, they would help you to get yours. But they and the rotten Whigs have never remembered you. Municipal Reform has been for their benefit—not yours. All other reforms the Whigs boast to have effected have been for the benefit of the middle classes—not yours. And now they want to get the Corn Law repealed—not for your benefit—but for their own. "Cheap Bread," they cry. But they mean "Low Wages." Do not listen to their cant and humbug. Stick to your charter. You are veritable slaves without your votes.¹

There were members of Parliament who wished the work of reform to go on. In this connection the proposals of the year 1837 are often mentioned.² Hume,³ for instance, stood for household suffrage, Tennyson,⁴ for the repeal of the Septennial Act, Molesworth,⁵ for reform of the upper

¹ Life of Thomas Cooper (London, 1872), pp. 136 and 137.

² Vide, for instance, Brodrick and Fotheringham, op. cit., vol. xi, p. 374.

³ Joseph Hume (1777-1855) voted early as a Tory but later became a Radical and carried the repeal of the combination laws.

⁴ Charles Tennyson (1784-1861), Liberal.

⁵ Sir William Molesworth (1810-1855), "Radical" and friend of J. S. Mill.

House, but such proposals made up no part of the Whig program. Lord John Russell, indeed, opposed the amendment to the address in answer to the Queen's speech in 1837 which demanded an extension of the suffrage, on the ground that the reopening of the question would destroy the stability of institutions! ¹

And, in the meantime, the protest against the existing order of things became stronger as the distress grew. The poor harvests of the late 'thirties, the enforcement of the new Poor Law when corn was rising to an average of more than sixty shillings per quarter, the suffering due to the supersession of manual labor by machinery and the displacement of agriculture and rural industry by manufactures, did not make the protests less vociferous. The politically active working class agitated for the six demands of the People's Charter: manhood suffrage, equal electoral districts, annual Parliaments, abolition of the property qualification for members of the House of Commons, vote by ballot, and salaries for members of Parliament. By the Charter they intended to obtain what they had not secured from the Reform bill of 1832: namely, control of the government to procure for themselves betterment of their social and economic position. Their agitation played an important part in the history of England for over ten years, especially during the lean years, but in the end did not attain its immediate objects. For various reasons the Chartist movement began to die out after 1848: ² the failure of a great petition may have caused an unfavorable reaction; the leadership was defective; the middle class never came to be connected intimately with the movement; and—perhaps most important of all—the betterment of economic conditions brought on a period often designated as a period of torpor.¹

¹ Hansard, vol. xxxix, p. 70.

² W. Nassau Molesworth, "History of the Reform Question from 1832 to 1866," Fortnightly Review, vol. vii, pp. 733 and 734, mentions: (1) failure of the monster petition; (2) failure of O'Connor's land scheme; (3) repeal of corn laws and success with free trade; (4) Poor Law beneficial by this time; (5) spread and success of the co-operative movement.

For, in the 'fifties, the prosperity in trade tended to contract the area of misery and unemployment.² In the fifteen years from 1850 to 1865 imports nearly trebled and exports more than doubled. During this period, although prices were rising, nominal wages were rising faster, with the result that there was a considerable increase in real wages.³ Stimulus was given to industry by the discovery of gold in California in 1848 and in Australia in 1850 and 1851—as the writers of the economic history of the period point out—and although financial crises brought ruin to many, favorable forces overbalanced the destructive influences.⁴ Railways were opening up districts hitherto inaccessible—hence came a fresh stimulus to manufacturers—more capital was forthcoming and more railways were built.⁵ Emigration to Australia and New Zealand multiplied the number of customers abroad. Great quantities of manufactures went to pay for the influx of gold with a consequent impulse to the shipbuilding trade. Agriculture, too, was thriving.⁶ The result of the general prosperity ✓

¹ Preston W. Slosson, in The Decline of the Chartist Movement (New York, 1916), chap. iv, gives a good discussion of the causes of the decline of the Chartist movement and stresses the influence of economic factors.

² H. D. Traill, Social England, 6 vols. (London, 1897), vol. vi, p. 423.

³ G. R. Porter, The Progress of the Nation, revised by F. W. Hirst (London, 1912), p. 56.

⁴ Traill, op. cit., p. 433.

⁵ A. L. Bowley, A Short Account of England's Foreign Trade in the Nineteenth Century, revised edition (London, 1905), pp. 58 et seq.

⁶ The London Times, Dec. 31, 1859, speaks of this as a period of an unprecedented duration of agricultural prosperity.

was such an increased demand for labor that the Times could declare in 1859:

It may be doubted whether greater accumulations of wealth have ever taken place in a period of ten years in any age or country, and for the first time within recent experience the reward of labor has increased even more largely than the profits of capital. . . . In every department of skilled industry able workmen find it in their power to command almost any price for their services.¹

And with the coming of prosperity, "the six points had almost passed out of the range of practical politics and only provoked a good-humored smile."²

The whole period under discussion, so far as the attitude of the working class toward the franchise question is concerned, is to be found in summary in the Edinburgh Review:

As regards the classes which are not within the limits of the franchise, a very great change has been operated in the course of the five-and-thirty years of which we have been speaking. The first part of that period was occupied in the abortive Chartist agitation. It was a period of great commercial depression and manufacturing distress; labor was cheap, employment precarious, wages low. It seemed to be a problem how the increasing masses in our manufacturing towns were to be fed or housed, and whether the means of subsistence could be made to keep pace with the ratio at which the population was increasing. Since then, time has solved all these problems—the discovery of the gold fields of California and Australia, the absorption caused by the Crimean war, and latterly, the enormous increase of our commerce and manufactures, resulting from our successful commercial policy, have changed the whole complexion of our laboring classes. Penury has given way to plenty; idleness to employment; disaffection to content. . . . The good which they (the workingmen) expected to result from the six points of the Charter has descended upon them from an unexpected quarter. Although the feeling among them in regard to their admission to the franchise is genuine and strong, it is altogether different, not in degree only but in kind, from that which animated the Chartist agitators in 1848.¹

¹ Ibid.

² Sir Spencer Walpole, The History of Twenty-five Years, 4 vols. (London, 1904-08), vol. i, p. 65.

During this period of torpor, however, the official class had seen fit to take up again the question of Parliamentary Reform. It was suggested here and there² that the Reform question was reopened by Lord John Russell because his Government was declining in popularity and power and needed such support as would probably come from those newly enfranchised under Liberal auspices. According to this interpretation, the agitation on the subject resulted from the activities of political leaders. It must not be supposed, however, that outside interest in Reform was entirely lacking: large and important meetings held early in 1852 at Manchester, Sheffield, Westminster and elsewhere, indicate that this was a question which still belonged among the great political questions of the day.³ The Queen's speech of 1852, in which appeared the following words, showed that at least some consideration was actuating the Government:

It appears to me that this is a fitting time for calmly considering whether it may not be advisable to make such amendments in the Act of the late reign relating to the representation of the Commons in Parliament as may be deemed calculated to carry into more complete effect the principles on which the law is founded.¹

¹ Edinburgh Review, vol. cxxiii, p. 283.

² Vide the Times, December 31, 1859, editorial, "A Review of the Decade."

³ Molesworth, op. cit., pp. 734 et seq.

And on the seventh of February Lord John Russell moved for leave to bring in a bill to extend the right of voting for members of Parliament. He proposed to lower the qualifications for the franchise in both county and borough, to raise the constituency of the small boroughs by adding neighboring places, to abolish the property qualifications of members, etc. But the bill was shortly afterwards withdrawn when the Government was defeated on a Militia bill.

Lord Aberdeen, the head of a coalition ministry of Whigs and Peelites, assisted by Lord John Russell as leader in the House of Commons, came into power within a year's time. It was announced that the Reform question would receive serious consideration. Meetings were held in Manchester and elsewhere to stir up interest in the subject. The bill which Russell brought forward in February, 1854, proposed the disfranchisement of several boroughs which together had twenty-nine members, the reduction to one representative of thirty-three of the smaller boroughs and the apportionment of the sixty-two seats to more populous places. Franchise qualifications were to be reduced and a whole series of new and fantastic methods for the enfranchisement of particular sections of the people was devised.² But this measure, too, had to be withdrawn when the minds of the members of the House and of the public in general were taken up with the Crimean War. At the close of the war the popularity of Palmerston, who had become head of the Government and was opposed to Reform in England, the consequent rejection of some of the more Radical Whigs in the election of 1857, and the Indian Mutiny all tended to injure the prospects of having the question successfully taken up at the moment.

¹ Annual Register, vol. xciv (1852), p. 4.

² Annual Register, vol. xcvi (1854), pp. 110-120.

In 1858, however, Palmerston's popularity began rapidly to wane when the Government, influenced by a plot ¹ against Louis Napoleon, brought in a bill to prevent foreign refugees from abusing the hospitality of the country. A suggestion that the Government was yielding to foreign dictation was enough to cause the rejection of the bill, and Lord Derby of the Conservative party was called upon to form a new ministry.² The Conservatives, perhaps thinking that the Liberals for their own interests had been identified with the Reform question for too long a period, decided to break the monopoly.³ Acting upon the supposition that a bill would be brought forward, agitators led by Bright became very active, hoping to gain large concessions.

On February 28, 1859, Mr. Disraeli, Chancellor of the Exchequer under Derby, brought in his bill. By this it was proposed not to alter the limits of the borough franchise but "to introduce a new kind of franchise, founded upon personal property, and to give a vote to persons having property to the amount of £10 a year in the Funds, Bank Stock, and East India Stock"; to enfranchise any persons having £60 in a savings bank, recipients of pensions of £20 in the naval, military or civil services, graduates, ministers of religion, members of the legal and medical professions, etc. The bill was to do away with the distinction between the county and borough franchise. Some little attention was given to redistribution.¹ Lord John Russell and Mr. Bright agreed in opposing the measure for the serious omission of any important proposal for the working class. Mr. Bright, speaking for the Radicals, thought that a Government representing a party which had always opposed the extension of political power to the people ought not to have undertaken to settle the question. In addition to the opposition from the Radicals, there was the opposition of those Conservatives² who did not like a measure which made the county and borough qualifications the same and the opposition of a large section of the Whigs who stood against Reform on general principles. Hence 291 voted for and 330 against the second reading, and the Government appealed to the country.

¹ A plot against the French Emperor's life had been planned by foreigners in London. The attempt to assassinate him failed but the French demanded in dictatorial terms that the English Government prevent such plots in future. Cf. Walpole, op. cit., vol. i, pp. 113 et seq.

² It was in this year that Mr. Locke King's bill for the abolition of the property qualifications required of English and Irish members (the 21 and 22 Vict., c. 26), was carried.

³ But cf. J. H. Murchison, The Conservatives and "Liberals," Their Principles and Policy (London, 1866), p. 45.

The result of the election was not favorable to the ministry, and Lord Palmerston assisted by Lord John Russell took office. This Government in turn decided to "supply the omissions and remedy the defects of the Act of 1832." Molesworth remarks that there was little distress, and public feeling in favor of their measure was slight: "The nation looked on, not certainly with indifference, but with comparative calmness, and regarded the contest as though the ascendancy of a party, rather than the welfare and prosperity of the nation, was involved in the issue."³ The bill itself provided for a £10 county and a £6 borough occupation franchise, and some little redistribution.⁴ But little enthusiasm in the Government accorded with little enthusiasm in the nation and after the second reading delay fol-

¹ Annual Register, vol. ci (1859), chap. iii.

² Henley, the President of the Board of Trade, and Walpole, the Home Secretary, retired from the Government, dreading "that identity of suffrage which is the principle of the Government Bill."

³ Molesworth, op. cit., p. 741.

⁴ Annual Register, vol. cii (1860), chap. iv.

lowed delay. Finally on the eleventh of June Lord John Russell withdrew the bill. Henceforth no Reform bill was brought forward by the Government until 1866.

Before the Liberals and Conservatives were again to manœuvre over the Reform question events happening beyond England's shores helped the cause of democracy and affected opinion in England itself. It is true that the results of the turmoil of 1848 on the Continent had not been very fruitful for democrats: instead of the republic of a Louis Blanc or the government of the middle-class republicans there came the empire of Louis Napoleon in France; instead of the reform projected by the Frankfort Assembly of 1848 there came a reactionary triumph with the restoration of the 1815 Confederation in Germany; instead of unity and democracy there came Austrian restoration in Venetia and to the various Italian thrones conservative princes and a Pope converted to conservatism. Nevertheless democracy still remained an ideal for the workingmen¹ and to both Sardinia and Prussia had been granted a constitution.

France had its Napoleon — but Napoleon ruled in the name of democracy. He was careful, however, to retain for himself control of the ministry, the power of initiating legislation, command of the army and navy, together with decisions upon questions of peace and war and the power of concluding treaties. The Corps législatif of two hundred and fifty-one members elected by direct manhood suffrage was carefully restricted in its powers. As Lecky points out, in spite of the fact that Legislative Assemblies were elected by universal suffrage, the government was an almost absolute despotism during the greater part of the reign.¹ Enemies rather than friends to an extended suffrage could therefore get inspiration from events across the Channel. When John Bright, the great English champion of Parliamentary Reform, reminded an audience in 1866 that universal suffrage existed in France, the Saturday Review reminded him that "in France universal suffrage produces an assembly of Crown nominees, which has no voice on peace or war, on the policy of the country, or on the appointment of a single clerk in a public office."² Blackwood's, a Conservative magazine, declared universal suffrage ineffective in France where "the result obtained by the ballot-box no more represented the real opinions and wishes of the inhabitants than if they had been marched up to the poll under an escort of military and compelled to vote, at the point of the bayonet, according to the dictates of the French Emperor, whose subjects they have now become."³ The pamphleteers of illiberal leanings likewise pointed to the failure of universal suffrage as a means of giving freedom to the French people. One declared that manhood suffrage in France had been consistent with a fettered press and trammels on speech and motion.⁴ Another asked: "France—is this a freer country than Eng-

¹Carlton J. H. Hayes, A Political and Social History of Modern Europe, 2 vols. (New York, 1917), vol. ii, p. 144.

¹ William Edward Hartpole Lecky, Democracy and Liberty, 2 vols. (New York, 1896), vol. i, p. 38.

² Saturday Review, September 1, 1866. Vide the attitude of this weekly on April 21, 1860, April 28, 1860, May 20, 1865, June 24, 1865, January 12, 1867, etc. In the number dated February 17, 1866, it acknowledges, however, that "no one can doubt that there is something both elevating and inspiring to the masses, both of the American and the French people, in the conviction which they feel that their Government belongs to them, represents them, embodies their views, and expresses their wishes."

³ Blackwood's, vol. lxxxviii, p. 107. The quotation is descriptive of conditions in Savoy and Nice but succeeding pages of the article show that the statement is regarded as true of France as a whole.

⁴ Frederic Hill, Parliamentary Reform, How the Representation may be Amended (London, 1865), p. 5.

land? . . . What does the present show us? Her most eloquent orators, writers and statesmen silenced, her press gagged—neither liberty of knowledge nor utterance, nor opinion, nor combination—her parliament packed; her elections a mockery.”¹

Moreover, little happened in German affairs between the middle of the century and 1865 to rouse the enthusiasm of the more liberal of the English. Austria had been given over completely to reaction, and in Prussia, Bismarck, firm believer in divine-right monarchy, was master. In the spring of 1866—when the Reform question was becoming important once more in British politics—Bismarck surprised the world, however, by advocating a reform of the confederation in such a way that there should be representation of the people by universal manhood suffrage. J. H. Rose points out that hostility to bureaucratic Austria moved him to make Prussia the champion in German affairs of the principle of a very slightly restricted suffrage.² Hypocrisy was the term applied to Bismarck’s action in many quarters. But after the victory over Austria in the Seven Weeks’ War there was formed the North German Confederation,³ the legislative power of which was vested in a Bundesrath, an assembly of deputies from the states, and a Reichstag, whose members were elected by equal, secret, direct and manhood suffrage.⁴

¹ “L,” Queries on the Franchise, an Examination of “the Seven Reasons” (Norwich, 1866), p. 29.

² Rose, Rise of Democracy, p. 180, but vide the statement of Heinrich von Sybel, Die Begründung des Deutschen Reiches durch Wilhelm I., 7 vols. (München, 1890-94), vol. iv, pp. 317 and 318, that Bismarck, believing in the interest of the masses in the maintenance of public order, considered universal suffrage a guaranty of conservatism.

³ The invitation to form such a Confederation had been given June 16, 1866; the scheme was adopted February 2, 1867.

⁴ A contrast to the situation within Prussia where because of the three-class system the suffrage was indirect and unequal.

German affairs interested the English public, as articles in the London Times testify. But Reform speakers referred to movements in Germany comparatively seldom. John Bright told an audience:

In Germany a vote is to be given to every man of twenty-five years of age and upwards, so that, if we were to propose a measure that would give a vote to every man of twenty-five years of age and upwards in this country, we should not be in advance of that great country of Northern Germany which is now being established. What is it that we are now come to in this country, that what is being rapidly conceded in all parts of the world is being persistently and obstinately refused here in England, the home of freedom, the mother of Parliaments? ¹

To this statement the Saturday Review retorted that Mr. Bright had dwelt with too much complacency on the "promiscuous suffrage" which Count Bismarck had announced as the proper basis of election for a German parliament and suggested that the eminent German champion of parliamentary privilege had probably little thought that he would be quoted by Mr. Bright as a pattern Reformer. It further warned that when the attributes of the new German parliament should be known, and when its relation to the Prussian House of Deputies should be defined, it would then be "time enough for the Mother of Parliaments to take a lesson from her youngest and least promising descendant." ²

Occasionally speeches made in Reform meetings contained a few sentences concerning Germany ³ or France,* a

¹ Quoted from the Saturday Review, September 1, 1866.

² Ibid.

* Vide speech of Colonel Dickson quoted infra, p. 112.

³ Replying to congratulations of the workingmen of London to the people of North Germany on recent events, Bismarck wrote on May 17, 1867: "I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution

pamphlet now and again referred to events on the Continent,¹ a Reform writer and speaker like Professor Beesly² might declare to a newspaper that he approved of the French type of democracy as contrasted with American democracy.³ Yet Rose's statement — that since 1830 the influence of Continental democratic movements on British politics has steadily declined⁴ — is applicable to the influence of Germany and France upon England in 1867.

Italy is the one Continental country whose influence upon British politics was of such importance that the foregoing statement would hardly hold true. Italian unity was destined to come from the leadership of Sardinia, the only Italian state where absolutism after 1849 had not conquered constitutionalism. Skilfully led by Cavour, Sardinia in 1859 won the assistance of Louis Napoleon in a war to drive Austria from the peninsula. Although that assistance did not free Venetia, the struggle did stir central Italy to demand unity under the Sardinian king. In southern Italy the activity of Garibaldi and his Thousand led to the overthrow of the Bourbons and the expressions of a desire on the part of the Sicilians and Neapolitans for union with the North. Plebiscites showed the strength of this desire. By 1861, Italy was well on the way to unity under a constitutional government.

passed at a meeting of metropolitan delegates from trades, friendly and temperance and other societies, and from a hundred London branches of the Reform League, congratulating the people of North Germany on the achievement of full representation and vote by ballot, and commenting very kindly on my conduct in advising and defending that Reform . . . " The Times, May 23, 1867.

¹ Cf. "L," Queries on the Franchise.

² E. S. Beesly had a professorship at University College, London. He wrote much in favor of trade unionism.

³ The Spectator, April 21, 1866.

⁴ Rose, Rise of Democracy, p. 146.

England was greatly influenced by this Italian movement for national unity. Louis Blanc made mention of the "impassioned interest" which England, considered as a whole, took in Italian affairs.¹ Her moral support, amid the strongly expressed disapprobation of the great Continental powers, gave, says Lecky, "both force and respectability to the Italian cause, and broke the isolation to which it would have otherwise been condemned."² It is true that the Conservatives, led by Lord Derby and Disraeli, with a feeling akin to that of the great Continental leaders, cherished antipathy to Italian independence and declared for the cause of legitimacy,³ but they were taking the unpopular attitude.⁴ Lord John Russell, on the other hand, urged that the Italian people should be allowed to form their own government freely without the intervention of either France or Austria, although—true Whig that he was—he refused to put stress on the verdict of universal suffrage as expressed by the plebiscites, but regarded the voice of the duly authorized representative bodies as the only legitimate expression of the people's wishes.⁵ Men of more liberal bent had greater enthusiasm for the Italian cause. Fawcett,⁶ for instance, feeling that the emancipa-¹Louis Blanc, Letters on England, translated from the French by James Hutton and revised by the author, 2 vols. (London, 1866), letter i.

²W. E. H. Lecky, Democracy and Liberty, vol. i, p. 495. Vide Herbert Paul, A History of Modern England, 5 vols. (New York, 1904), vol. ii, p. 224, for a still stronger statement of England's influence.

³The Saturday Review, April 26, 1862.

⁴*Saturday Review*, July 1, 1865. Vide, also, Frazer's vol. lxiv, July, 1861.

⁵Lecky, Democracy and Liberty, vol. i, pp. 493-495.

⁶Henry Fawcett was a vigorous but as yet subordinate member of the Radical party. Accidentally blinded in 1858 he remained actively concerned with public affairs and was elected to Parliament July, 1865, as member for Brighton.

tion of Italy was only one of the many struggles going on in society to give the lesser man a fair chance, correlated this movement with that of the British laboring class, which he championed. He was thus "a lusty swimmer on this tide of freedom."¹ Gladstone, important in the counsels of the Liberals,² was referred to by a weekly as a patron and associate of Italian exiles and liberals.³ In April, 1862, he made a great speech in the House of Commons in which he approved of Italian yearnings. His attitude helped to secure for him a hold "upon all of the rising generation of liberals who cared for the influence and the good name of Great Britain in Europe, and who were capable of sympathizing with popular feeling and the claims of national justice."⁴ The majority of educated men and the middle class in general felt sympathy for Italy;⁵ the working class showed its interest on one occasion by presenting to Garibaldi as a testimonial a gold watch and chain purchased by penny subscription.⁶ So intense was their feeling

¹ Winifred Holt, A Beacon for the Blind Being a Life of Henry Fawcett the Blind Postmaster General (Boston, 1914), p. 157. Vide, also, Saturday Review, September 17, 1864, "The New Reformers."

² Details of his life and importance are given in chap. iv.

³ Saturday Review, July 1, 1865.

⁴ John Morley, The Life of William Ewart Gladstone, 3 vols. (London, 1903), vol. ii, p. 108.

⁵ Saturday Review, January 31, 1863.

⁶ This was done by the townspeople of Brighton. Vide the Times, April 18, 1861. The acknowledgment of Garibaldi came to Mr. Coningham, M. P.,—"Be pleased to express my feelings of great gratitude to the English working men, to which good and laborious class I am proud to belong, for the valuable gift which they have transmitted to me through you. I knew that the hour of Italian nationality was marked on the dialplate of time; but, observing that in my own country many denied this, because the counsels of the foreigner and dastardly fears would have it so, it is a great comfort to me to find that hour indicated by the watch which the people of Brighton have given to me."

that it seemed probable to one writer ¹ that England would not have hesitated to join France in recovering Italy for the Italians in 1859 had the working class been fully represented in Parliament at that time.

The full effect of Italian events upon British politics was probably first felt as a result of Garibaldi's visit to England in the spring of 1864. Seldom has a foreign hero met with the reception accorded Garibaldi by the London populace. To the working class he appeared as one striving for liberation of enslaved peoples all over the face of the globe,² a soldier who bore the sword for human freedom.³ It was such a belief that gave him great popularity. "In those days," says Morley, "there were idealists; democracy was conscious of common interests and common brotherhood."⁴ Thus was there being created an atmosphere in which democracy could triumph.⁵

The enthusiasm aroused by Garibaldi's visit among the millions of unenfranchised workingmen alarmed both Whig and Tory leaders. Disraeli, regarding the hero as the foe of constituted authority in both church and state, refused to meet him, although other Tories paid their respects.⁶

¹R. H. Hutton, The Political Character of the Working Class (London, 1867), pp. 31 and 32.

²*Saturday Review*, December 16, 1865, speaking of the attitude of the Reform League toward him. When later Garibaldi accepted the Honorary Presidency of the Reform League, the League thanked him for accepting the honor and addressed him as the proved champion of true liberty in all countries. Vide the Times, May 20, 1867.

³Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, p. 109.

⁴*Ibid.* Qualifications for the franchise were not such, of course, as to give anything like democracy to the Italians, but by the activity of men like Garibaldi and by the expression of opinions in plebiscites, the desires of the great masses for unity had been obtained.

⁵George Macaulay Trevelyan, The Life of John Bright (London, 1913), p. 331.

⁶Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli, vol. iv, pp. 327-328.

Whigs received him in their homes but kept him from contact with the people, "to whom he might act as a flame of tinder."¹ After the reception in London what might not happen in the manufacturing centers? "Fears of this sort were added to other reasons why Palmerston's Government wished to prevent his longer stay in England."²

Although Garibaldi did not make a projected tour of the "provinces", his stay in England was long enough to react upon the feelings of the great Liberal leader Gladstone. In May of 1864 the latter uttered in the House of Commons words which could mean only that he was willing to break the Victorian compromise. Speaking of Parliamentary Reform, he said: "I venture to say that every man who is not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness or of political danger is morally entitled to come within the pale of the constitution."³ Of the effects of such a statement upon Gladstone's position among the official class, explanation will be made later; that such sentiment came directly from the Italian influences is vouched for by Gladstone's great opponent, Disraeli himself. Referring to the foregoing quotation in a letter to Lord Derby, Disraeli wrote: "Though Gladstone's move was matured, and, indeed, for a considerable time contemplated, I have no doubt the visit and reception of Garibaldi have acted on his impressionable nature, and have betrayed him into a far more extreme position than was at first intended."⁴ Gladstone's own biographer has summed up the effect of Italian liberation as follows:

It is easy to see some at any rate of the influences that were

¹ Trevelyan, Life of Bright, p. 331.

² Ibid.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxv, p. 324.

⁴ Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 404.

bringing Mr. Gladstone decisively into harmony with the movement of liberal opinions, now gradually spreading over Great Britain. The resurrection of Italy could only be vindicated on principles of liberty and the right of a nation to choose its own rulers. The peers and the ten-pound householders who held power in England were no Bourbon tyrants; but just as in 1830 the overthrow of the Bourbon line in France was followed by the Reform bill here, so the Italian revolution of 1860 gave new vitality to the popular side in England.¹

Important as was the influence of Italy upon democracy's cause in England, still more important for the growth of democratic tendencies was the outcome of the Civil War in America. In this struggle democracy was on trial. England had already learned of the benefits of American democracy. John Bright for many years had carried its fiery cross, as the Saturday Review complained,² through the length and breadth of the manufacturing districts preaching Reform in all weathers, as Peter the Hermit preached crusades.

With the outbreak of the Civil War in April, 1861, the Saturday Review itself was to have the opportunity of going on a crusade—a crusade against democracy and John Bright. The failure of the "Model Republic" to keep an undivided household was suggestive enough of the unhappy ending of a great experiment in government, but the expedients to which America had recourse in attempting to preserve itself intact were in the opinion of the magazine absolutely damaging to the democratic cause.³ The reckless expenditure of funds,⁴ the absolutism of the adminis-

¹ Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, pp. 123 and 124.

² Saturday Review, February 2, 1867. Vide issues for November 26, 1859, January 21, 1860, December 8, 1866.

³ Saturday Review, October 12, 1861, and February 1, 1862.

⁴ Saturday Review, September 14, 1861.

tration with its repression of free discussion, the disappearance of every guaranty of liberty, the ubiquitous police, the muzzled press, gave to those opposed to democratic movements an estimation of the opinion in which future true lovers of liberty would hold democracy. If the Radicals still rallied around Bright when all his prophecies had failed, when the delusive confusion between freedom and democracy was being finally banished from the minds of Englishmen,¹ scarcely could it be said that the ages of faith had passed away.² Since the United States which practised universal suffrage had become involved in hopeless difficulties, it would be madness to lower the qualification for the suffrage in England and "overthrow the only free representation of sound public opinion which exercised sovereign power in any part of the world."³

Against democracy and John Bright the Saturday Review was not a solitary crusader. The press, almost as a whole, joined on its side of the struggle. To Blackwood's the evils of democracy were not accidental, as might be concluded from the example of the French Revolution, but inherent, as was shown in the result of the experiment conducted under the most favorable circumstances in America.

That example should teach both rulers and peoples moderation . . . And we have written in vain if we have not also deduced a moral for those who would seek to improve our own condition by assimilating our institutions to those of America. Our own agitators, in their clamour for reform, are descending towards universal suffrage. Universal suffrage means, the government of a numerical majority, which means oppression—which means civil war. What civil war, even in its mildest form, means, we know from the Times' correspondent; and most heartily do we,

¹ Saturday Review, September 14, 1861.

² Saturday Review, October 12, 1861.

³ Saturday Review, November 23, 1861, and February 23, 1861.

in concluding this article, echo his wish—"God defend us from mob law."¹

*Frazer's*² and the Quarterly Review joined the forces of those mentioned. The latter could now rejoice that Bright no longer had America to fall back upon because "the great Republican bubble has burst."³ The London Times, the opinions of which counted for more in both England and the United States than those of any other English publication, had a warm sympathy with the aristocracy across the sea.⁴

Yet the press, in its hostility to the North, merely represented the opinions of the classes which were powerful in society and in Parliament. Palmerston, leader of the Government, was distrusted by Charles Francis Adams, the American minister to England.⁵ Gladstone, friendly to Italian unity, was guilty in 1862 of uttering words whose connotation he later found it difficult to explain: "There is no doubt that Jefferson Davis and other leaders of the South have made an army; they are making, it appears, a navy; they have made what is more than either—they have made a nation. . . . We may anticipate with certainty the success of the Southern States so far as regards their separation from the North."⁶ Disraeli thought that the United States was breaking down. He and most of

¹ Blackwood's, October, 1861, "Democracy Teaching by Example," p. 405.

² Vide issues of November, 1859, and July, 1862.

³ Quarterly Review, vol. cx, pp. 254-256.

⁴ Vide Charles Francis Adams, Charles Francis Adams (Boston, 1900), p. 349, and James Ford Rhodes, History of the United States, 8 vols. (New York, 1900-19), vol. iv, pp. 82-84. The Spectator often opposed the opinions of the Times.

⁵ Adams, Charles Francis Adams, p. 241.

⁶ The Times, October 9, 1862.

his followers took it that the disruption of Bright's ideal democratic community showed the instability of an extended suffrage as the foundation of a state, and believed that the collapse of republican institutions would tell greatly in favor of aristocracy.¹ But Disraeli had the wisdom to keep his opinions to himself.

The aristocracy and the upper middle classes were hostile to the United States because pure democracy was hateful to them, wrote Cobden.² Mr. Trevelyan, in the Life of John Bright declares that "the Conservative classes, Tory and Whig, were nervously aware that Bright's democratic movement was threatening their own monopoly of political power. If democracy triumphed in America, nothing could long delay its advent over here. But if democracy in America failed, the reaction would be strongly felt in Europe and most of all in Great Britain." He goes on to say that Motley³ found the situation unbearable and wrote after Bull Run, "The real secret of the exultation which manifests itself in the Times and other organs over our troubles and disasters is their hatred, not to America so much as to democracy in England."⁴ The Quarterly Review wrote that the American proceedings would have been discussed less eagerly in England and criticized with less freedom if they had not been made the turning point of a political controversy at home. Battles on American soil were deciding the status of Mr. Bright's theories.⁵ Mr. W. E. Forster at

¹ Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, pp. 328 and 402.

² T. Wemyss Reid, Life of the Right Honorable William Edward Forster, 2 vols. (London, 1888, 2nd edition), vol. i, p. 341.

³ The historian, Motley, was in England from 1859 to the middle of 1861. In August, 1861, he left the United States to which he had returned two months before, as minister to Austria.

⁴ Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, pp. 304-305.

⁵ Quarterly Review, vol. cxii, "The Confederate Struggle and Recognition."

a Reform meeting of May 16, 1865, at Manchester clearly stated that dislike of democracy was the cause of the hostile attitude toward the North:

What was it made such a large portion of our aristocracy espouse the cause of the South? He did not believe it was love of slavery, or even hatred to a republic, though that might have had something to do with it (Applause). He believed it was an instinctive feeling that there was a chance for aristocratic government such as had not been seen before; that in that manœuvring oligarchy of the South, although they might not be proud of them as a very good imitation of themselves (a laugh)—yet, after all, there was the hope that there, in a young Anglo-Saxon country, an aristocracy was taking root, which, if the South obtained power, would be a strong force in the world. It was an instinctive feeling of that kind which made the aristocracy rally to the South, and made one of their most talented representatives (Lord Robert Cecil) say in the House of Commons that the South were our natural allies. (Loud laughter and groans.) They certainly were natural allies of Lord Cecil's order, but not the natural allies of England. (Applause).¹

There were also other reasons for a hostile attitude. According to Louis Blanc, not only the democratic institutions but the prodigious development of power under those institutions grieved aristocratic England.² The feeling of jealousy toward the power of the great republic of the West and the wish that it might be weakened by the success of the rebellion did exist.³ The high tariff of the North contrasted poorly in the Englishman's eye with the free trade of the South. Commercial and manufacturing interests desired an early end to a war that was preventing the importation of raw cotton in England and the exportation of manufactured goods to America.¹ Moreover, many of the English believed that the South was within its constitutional rights in withdrawing from a distasteful union, and others argued that the South had the doctrine of the rights of nationalities on its side.² A "sporting spirit," on one hand, led to a partisan interest in the welfare of the comparatively small power skilfully carrying on a desperate struggle with an unwieldy and gigantic adversary;³ a conservative judgment, on the other, might decide that final subjugation of five and a half millions of people was impossible and that continuation of warfare was a useless waste of life.⁴

¹ The Times, May 19, 1865.

² Louis Blanc, Letters on England, letter xlviii.

³ Vide William Harris, History of the Radical Party in Parliament (London, 1885), pp. 447-448.

Fortunately for the United States, these causes of English hostility did not appeal to certain leaders of the lower classes or to those classes themselves. Bright, Cobden and W. E. Forster were the three important men of the middle-class element who remained friendly to the United States,⁵ "the friends of free labor and advocates of a democratic republic."⁶ Confederate statesmen knew their influence and feared much their opposition to the recognition of a slaveholders' Confederacy.⁷ Mention of Bright and Cobden has been made before. They understood the real meaning of the struggle going on across the water. Bright told ¹Rhodes, History of the United States, vol. iv, pp. 77 and 78.

²*Vide* Lecky, Democracy and Liberty, vol. i, pp. 487 and 488.

³*Ibid.*, p. 487, and Morley, vol. ii, pp. 85 and 86.

⁴Rhodes, vol. iv, p. 78, and Lecky, vol. i, p. 488. Vide, also, Leslie Stephen, The "Times" on the American War, reprinted in the Magazine of History, vol. x.

⁵Reid, Life of Forster, vol. i, p. 338.

⁶Adams, Charles Francis Adams, p. 156.

⁷*Ibid.*, pp. 262, 299, 302.

a meeting of skilled laborers, held in London on March 26, 1863, that the struggle was between two sections of a country, in one of which labor was honored more than elsewhere in the world and men might "rise to competence and independence," and in the other of which labor was degraded and the laborer made a chattel.¹ W. E. Forster was rather young in parliamentary life, having first been elected as a member of the House of Commons from Bradford in 1861. He proved to be, in the opinion of Charles Francis Adams, "the most earnest, the most courageous, and the most effective friend the United States had among men prominent in English life."² All three were influential in guiding the opinions of the working class.

To the workingmen, especially to the Lancashire operatives, honor has continued to be given for holding to the cause of the North when dire distress caused by the cotton famine³ naturally would have led them to demand an end to the Northern blockade of Southern ports. Their interest in the matter, far deeper than that of the professional classes, an interest opposed to the line of policy they adopted, did not blind them to the great idea involved in the struggle; ⁴ freedom contending with slavery called not in vain for their support. Even when the outcome of the war seemed destined to be unfavorable to the Union—toward the close of 1862 and in the early months of 1863—their public meetings gave strong manifestation of sympathy for the North. Writing of their attitude, Louis Blanc said:

¹ John Bright, Speeches on Questions of Public Policy, edited by James E. Thorold Rogers (London, 1868), vol. i, pp. 248 and 249.

² Adams, Charles Francis Adams, pp. 263 and 188.

³ For details, vide chap. ii.

⁴ R. H. Hutton, The Political Character of the Working Class, pp. 30 and 31.

While the members of the aristocracy, the landed proprietors, the great manufacturers, and the politicians of the drawing room or the club, breathe nothing but vengeance, war, and victory, it is to what an imbecile pride is accustomed to call the lower stratum of society, that we must descend to look for calmness, moderation and a thoughtful love of peace.¹

Until July, 1863, the foes rather than the friends of democracy had cause for happiness. Neither abroad nor at home was the American government reaping advantages. In the latter part of 1861, the American Captain Wilkes of the San Jacinto nearly caused war with Great Britain by stopping the British mail steamer Trent and taking forcibly from it two accredited Confederate emissaries; in 1862 Louis Napoleon and English public men were pressing the British government towards recognition of the South.² Feeling among the upper classes was so intense that the Emancipation Proclamation was interpreted as a sham to deceive Europe. Moreover, Union forces in the field were not successful. The Saturday Review declared that American events were causing the influence of radicalism to wane.³ Blackwood's shows very well the satisfaction of the conservative press:

It would perhaps be too much to say that the tendencies of our constitution towards democracy have been checked solely by a view of the tattered and insolvent guise in which republicanism appears in America. The right instinct and good sense of the country had already preserved it from following the Reform leaders in their downward strides to the declivity that overhangs chaos. . . . As the pause, however, proceeded from indifference rather than conviction, that season might have arrived, and the effort might have been renewed. But the events which have since passed in America have made a deep impression on the public mind. Theorists might have uttered warnings through an entire generation without producing a tithe of the effect which has followed from the spectacle of floundering democracy. . . . The only result at present of a proposal to "Americanise our institutions" on an audience who are witnessing the Transatlantic exhibition, would be to induce a belief that the proposer was insane. Possibly the time is not very distant when what have lately been propounded as great political truths may, for a season at least, be classed among the most astonishing delusions; when faith in political equality and universal suffrage will appear as absurd and unintelligible as in right divine and the infallibility of the Pope.¹

¹ Louis Blanc, Letters on England, letter xlviii, p. 252.

² Adams, Charles Francis Adams, p. 278.

³ Saturday Review, August 2, 1862.

But the aristocracy was shocked by the victories of Gettysburg and Vicksburg in July, 1863.² A possibility of war between England and America was contingent upon the escape of iron-clad rams which were being built in England for the breaking of the blockade. Their escape would probably have been much more damaging to the cause of the North than had been the escape of the Alabama.³ Earl Russell's activity warded off that danger in the fall of 1863. Thereafter there was little chance of intervention. By March, 1865, the Spectator declared that the House had at last become convinced that the North must win.⁴ Cobden in a letter dated February 5, 1865, wrote to the American minister at Copenhagen: ⁵

¹ Blackwood's, April, 1862, p. 514.

² R. Barry O'Brien, John Bright, A Monograph (London, 1910), pp. 157 and 158.

³ The Alabama escaped from Liverpool in July, 1862, and during her career burned fifty-seven vessels of a value of over six and a half million dollars. Vide Rhodes, vol. iv, pp. 365 and 366.

⁴ The Spectator, March 18, 1865.

⁵ Bradford R. Wood was the minister to Denmark in the early part of 1865.

Democracy has discovered how few friends it has in Europe among the ruling class. It has at the same time discovered its own strength, and, what is more, this has been discovered by the aristocracies and absolutisms of the Old World. So that I think you are more safe than ever against the risks of intervention from this side of the Atlantic. Besides, you must not forget that the working class of England, who will not be always without direct political power, have, in spite of their sufferings and the attempt made to mislead them, adhered nobly to the cause of civilization and freedom.¹

Democracy came out of the struggle triumphant and the workingmen were vindicated. By their clearness of insight into the merits of a great national question and by their resolute determination to support the right, they had proved that they might be called upon to take part in their own government with safety and advantage.² Mr. Forster told them that "if any community had done anything towards helping the right cause, and taking care that England was not disgraced in all future history by going on the wrong side in this contest, it had been the working men of Lancashire." And he added: "If they had a care about Reform they would be repaid for what they had done, by the lesson which the triumph of freedom, the triumph of popular government in America taught those who refused the workingmen their rights."³ For their part the workingmen continued to look with enthusiasm toward the American Republic. The Saturday Review complained that "even the audacious anticipation of one speaker, that in the course of years England would be absorbed by the Western Republic, was received [by them] certainly without any too patriotic discomposure, and even with a measure of approval, as if it were probably about the best thing that could happen to us.”¹

¹ The Times, April 3, 1865.

² William Harris, The Radical Party in Parliament, p. 448. Vide, also, Winifred Holt, A Beacon for the Blind, p. 157.

³ At a Reform meeting at Manchester. Vide the Times, May 19, 1865.

The various magazines, indeed, bear witness to the fact that the victory of the Union reacted for the cause of democracy, just as the expected failure had reacted for the power of aristocracy. The Spectator declared that democracy in America had come victorious out of a war which would have crushed any European monarchy except the British, and had overcome a rebellion before which even Great Britain might possibly have succumbed.² In 1866 the Fortnightly Review pointed out that a few years ago republican government had been on its trial in America and its success seemed to be uncertain. “There was then a lull in the Reform movement in England, and a very moderate measure would have satisfied its supporters. . . . The United States have exhibited a wealth, a strength, an organization, a temperance and moderation after their great successes, which show that universal suffrage and the freest institutions are compatible with a well-ordered state.”³

The outcome of the American struggle had a great effect, too, upon the opinions of certain of the political leaders like Gladstone. He had learned that “universal suffrage had proved itself compatible with the display of certain great qualities.”⁴ Gladstone’s biographer mentions that American events had “reversed the fashionable habit of making American institutions English bugbears, and gave a sweeping impulse to that steady but resistless tide of liberal and popular sentiment that ended in the parliamentary

¹ Saturday Review, December 16, 1865.

² The Spectator, July 1, 1865; vide, also, the number for February 17, 1866.

³ Fortnightly Review, September 15, 1866.

⁴ Saturday Review, April 14, 1866.

reform of 1867.”¹ As the Americans themselves foresaw, the liberal, democratic, progressive party headed by John Bright and his friends had a prodigious increase of power.²

The evidence showing the influence of America upon England has been striking enough to call forth the statement that “it is hardly too much to say that the Reform Bill of 1867 was a direct product of the Northern triumph in the American war.”³ In April, 1866, Professor Beesly, when addressing a Reform meeting, attributed the revival of the Reform agitation to the result of the American war and observed that republicanism was looking up in the world.⁴

Nevertheless, succeeding chapters will show that the power of the urban artisan class, especially as exerted through their trade unions, made their admission to political power inevitable⁵ when once their feeling had been aroused by economic pressure, the eloquence of their middle-class leaders and the openly-expressed hostility of the majority of the members of Parliament. For, it will be seen,⁶ the majority of members, even in the lower House, were still hostile to anything approaching democracy in 1866, although they could not point to its failure. But events in Italy and America were of influence at least to this extent: they gave inspiration and confidence to men like Bright and Forster and had not a little to do with the changing attitude of a less radical person like Gladstone, and they

¹ Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, p. 124.

² Vide the Times, April 16, 1866, quoting the New York Times.

³ William Archibald Dunning, The British Empire and the United States (New York, 1914), p. 230.

⁴ The Times, April 12, 1866.

⁵ Cf. Bernard Holland, The Life of Spencer Compton, Eighth Duke of Devonshire, 2 vols. (London, 1911), vol. i, pp. 64 and 65.

⁶ In chap. iv.

kept England from becoming reactionary, from being handed over for years, as it was after 1815, to an administration resolved to resist all changes as "dangerous to our institutions."¹

¹*Cf. the Spectator*, July 15, 1865.

CHAPTER II

CONDITION OF THE WORKING CLASS IN THE 'SIXTIES

IN the foregoing pages note was made of the fact that the working class, during the prosperous years of the 'fifties, ceased that violent agitation which was carried on in the unfortunate decade of the 'forties. During the years 1866 and 1867, it will be seen,¹ an agitation for political Reform once again was taken up. Naturally the question arises: did the economic situation in the 'sixties help to stir up discontent?—Such is the question with which the present chapter will deal.

The early 'sixties, indeed, need very little attention, inasmuch as conditions in general show much the same prosperity as was evident during most of the preceding ten years. Agricultural prosperity may be said to have lasted from 1854 to the end of 1865. 1860 ought to be mentioned as an exception although even during the winter of that year free trade happily obviated to a great extent the effects of domestic scarcity. For, owing to the very large importations of grain from Europe and America, the cost of "the prime necessary of life"—as the *Annual Register*² points out—was kept within moderate bounds and occasioned but little pressure upon the poorer classes. With commercial, financial and industrial conditions, there was little room for complaint. The revenue was proving the satisfactory state of industry; the returns issued by the Board of Trade were testifying to the continued expansion and development of commerce.

¹ Cf. infra, pp. 101 et seq.

² Annual Register, vol. ciii (1861), p. 2.

1865, as representing the middle section of the decade, likewise gave an encouraging report. The circulars sent to the Economist, with scarcely an exception, were filled with congratulations on the prosperous results of the trade of that year. The woolen, cotton, iron, linen, shipping, hardware, chemical, timber, and building trades were all active.¹ The cessation of the Civil War in America and the consequent demand of the American market doubtless contributed largely to this result during the latter part of the year.² There was no great number of commercial failures. Uncertainty in the cotton market caused some difficulty, however, and a demand on the Bank of England due to the remittance of gold in an attempt to hasten the arrival of raw cotton meant a considerable drain of bullion and frequent and severe variations of the rate of discount.³ Wages were advancing. The harvest, though not highly productive, was generally of a fair average character.⁴ In short, the main elements of the national strength—agriculture, commerce, manufactures—were well sustained and gave promise of increased development; public finances were eminently buoyant and transactions of foreign commerce were on the largest scale.⁵ And, had there been a great "abatement in the painful contrast" which still existed even in a prosperous year between enormous wealth and luxury on one hand and painful destitution and pauperism on the other, England's annalist might have been still more cheerful.

¹ The Economist, March 10, 1866—supplement, "Commercial History and Review of 1865."

² Ibid., p. 1.

³ Ibid., p. 2.

⁴ Annual Register, 1865, new series, p. 160.

⁵ Ibid., p. 185.

Noteworthy exceptions there were, to be sure, to this generally favorable description, the most important of which was the cotton famine due to the American Civil War. Although possibly many cotton spinners would have been ruined by a surplus of raw material at hand at the opening of the war and an overcrowded market of manufactured goods which must have been sold at a sacrifice, the surplus was quickly used up when the regular supply was cut off, and soon factories had to cease work and the millhands found themselves out of employment. Just how important the cotton industry was, may be seen from the fact that the trade profits of Lancashire in 1860 constituted nearly one-fifth of the entire amount classed under that head for all England.¹ Consequently the distress occasioned by the partial or total stoppage of the cotton mills was great. The situation was the most pressing a short time prior to Christmas, 1862:² the weekly loss of wages in the cotton manufacturing districts at that time was estimated at approximately £168,000.³ The number of paupers relieved in the distressed unions of Lancashire and Cheshire the first week of December, 1862, was 284,418; during the first week of January, 1863, 266,450, and during the first week of February, 1863, 236,780.⁴ By the first week of September, 1863, the number had dropped to 155,163. Thereafter, except for a reaction⁵ from October, 1863, to February, 1864, there was improvement in employment until September and October of 1864 when rumors of peace caused fluctuations in the prices of cotton. By 1864, however, the difficulties

¹ Journal of the Statistical Society of London, 1862, p. 536.

² Accounts and Papers, 1863 (100-I) lii, 157 et seq.

³ Annual Register, 1863, new series, p. 140.

⁴ Accounts and Papers, op. cit.

⁵ Vide Thomas Mackey, History of the English Poor Law (London, 1899), p. 415, and Accounts and Papers, 1863 (515) lii, 220.

of the operatives had been lessened by imports of the raw material from various quarters of the world and by the absorption of the redundant labor in other channels, and the cotton famine may be considered to have terminated.¹

The distress had been alleviated somewhat, and the losses of wages made up, to a partial extent, by the rates levied under the poor law and the voluntary contributions of the public—the latter yielding by far the larger amount. Before the end of January, 1863, these voluntary contributions, from the various parts of the United Kingdom and from the Colonies, had exceeded three quarters of a million sterling.² The fund was controlled and allocated in weekly sums by committees. The amount thus obtained by the operatives plus that granted by the poor rates gave just bare subsistence. The poor rates were obtained by the Union Relief Aid Act³ from such an extensive territory that the burden of the distressed parishes was relieved by contributions from adjoining districts. By the same Act loans on mortgage of the rates could be raised for the purpose of affording relief. This Act, limited in its operation to the first of March, 1863, was extended to June and then passed again. In the early part of the summer of 1864 a new plan to help—the Public Works Act⁴—was passed. By its provisions loans were to be issued by the Government, at a low rate of interest, to the local authorities in the cotton manufacturing districts, for the purpose of enabling them to employ the operatives who were thrown out of work in executing improvements required in the various towns, such as drainage, construction of roads, water works, and similar undertakings.

¹ The Times, June 19, 1865.

² Annual Register, 1863, p. 2.

³ 25 and 26 Vict., c. 110; cf. Annual Register, 1863, pp. 151-4.

⁴ 27 and 28 Vict., c. 104.

Yet the calamity produced by the cotton famine was, to the Annual Register, not without its alleviating circumstances.¹ It was endured by the working class with a patience which did not escape notice, it excited universal sympathy, and it was not attended with that degree of demoralization which might have been anticipated from so great a dislocation of ordinary habits and industrious pursuits. The sufferers felt that the distress to which they were reduced was owing to no neglect or errors of the Government, no injustice of the laws under which they lived. In fact, with but a single exception there was no disturbance, no outrage, scarcely any agitation or audible complaint throughout the heavily afflicted districts. That exception—an outbreak of two or three days in March, 1863, at Ashton-under-Lyne and adjacent territory—occurred over payments in tickets instead of money by the relief committee. Several shops and houses were plundered by the mob. Troops assisted in stopping the rioting. Forty-two persons were finally convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from one to six months, but it was believed that the majority of the disturbers were people who had never worked in the mills.

Closely connected with the cotton famine was a commercial crisis of the year 1864.² Since the commencement of the war, cotton had been a favorite article for speculation, as was also, to a lesser extent perhaps, sugar, tallow, jute, rice and fruit. Quotations had reached a very high point when rumors of peace were freely circulated. The price of cotton and of the other articles that were unduly advanced, began to recede, and soon came the announcement of several failures. Joint stock companies felt the strain.

¹ Annual Register, 1863, p. 2.

² Vide Economist, March 11, 1865, supplement, "Commercial History and Review of 1864."

The extraordinarily low prices of all classes of production, however, soon began to attract buyers; a favorable reaction set in and before the end of October the commercial prospect began to brighten.

The year 1865 also had its exception to the generally favorable conditions in the appearance of the cattle plague or rinderpest — an event which, because of its continued duration and influence, belongs to the year 1866 as well as to 1865. Whole herds of cattle around London died off; ¹ one inspector who had charge of a great part of the north and northeast of London stated that in his own district more than four-fifths had either died or been slaughtered. By the early winter of 1865 the disease had spread in many counties of England, in Scotland and Wales, and continued to work destruction during the whole of the following year. The effect of the plague upon the price of commodities was a cause of public anxiety: mutton and beef were charged by the butchers in the autumn of 1865 at twenty or twenty-five per cent above the rates of preceding years, and the price of milk rose twenty per cent.²

On the whole, however, the period of the early 'sixties may be said to have been prosperous. The one great exception is, of course, the distress in the cotton manufacturing districts, but the cause of that distress, it seems, was patent to the workingmen and no blame could be placed either upon the Government or upon the ruling classes. Because of the cotton famine the percentage of unemployed during 1861, 1862, and 1863 was very large, indeed. On the other hand, the average money wages rose, if 1850 is taken as the base year,³ from 114 in 1860, 116 in 1862,

¹ Annual Register, 1865, p. 161.

² Ibid., p. 170.

³ When a year or a fixed period is taken as the standard, or base, its

117 in 1863, to 124 and 126 in 1864 and 1865 respectively, while average retail prices went from 111 in 1860 and 114 in 1861 to 106 in 1864 and 107 in 1865. Real wages for a workman of unchanged grade rose from 99 and 97 in 1860 and 1861 respectively to 100 in 1862, 104 in 1863, and 110 in 1864 and 1865, a point which was not again reached in the 'sixties. And trade was increasing by leaps and bounds.

A study of the years 1866 and 1867, however, gives by no means so favorable a picture of economic conditions. The harvest during both years was poor. In the critical months of August and September, 1866, the weather was unusually wet and stormy and the wheat crops suffered much.¹ With a yield decidedly below the average, prices were much enhanced. This circumstance, combined with a contraction of the demand for labor, arising from commercial failures, and the exceptionally severe weather, made the winter of 1866-1867, as will be seen,² a period of considerable suffering to the poorer classes. A generally poor harvest of 1866, moreover, extended over all Western Europe, presaging a restriction of the purchasing means of the bulk of the population.³ In 1867, too, the yield of the cereal crops was so decidedly below the average that large importations were necessary.⁴ The average price of wheat per imperial quarter for the calendar year 1863 had been staples are represented by an index arbitrarily fixed at 100. The ratios obtained by comparing staples at a given time with the base, give index numbers.

The index numbers of George H. Wood in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, 1909, "Real Wages and the Standard of Comfort since 1850" are here used.

¹ Annual Register, 1866, p. 186.

² Cf. infra, pp. 75 et seq.

³ The Economist, March 9, 1867, supplement, "Commercial History and Review of 1866," p. 1.

⁴ Annual Register, 1867, p. 204.

44s. 9d.; for 1864, 40s. 2d.; for 1865, 41s. 10d.; but so unfavorable was the harvest of 1866 that the average price was 49s. 11d. From 45s. 9d. at the first of May it had risen to 60s. by the last week of December. It stayed around this figure through March and then gradually advanced until at the end of May, 1867, it stood at 65s. 3d. Since July, 1866, the country had had a price of wheat from sixty to eighty per cent above the prices which prevailed in the last three years, 1863-1865; the same remark would hold good of a large part of Europe and America. "In the wide diffusion of a calamity of this magnitude," said a writer in the Economist, "there is afforded at once an explanation of a large part of the difficulties of 1866 and 1867, and the present time."¹ It was estimated that the harvest of these two years entailed an extra cost of at least forty millions sterling on the country²—at the very time, too, when a severe collapse of enterprise and credit was having its bad effects.

With regard to financial and commercial matters the year 1866 started off in a fair condition. It is true that even during the first part of the year a high rate of interest and a mania for speculation was causing some foreboding but it was commonly asserted that trade was healthy,³ and the failure of one or two country banks was attributed to local causes. The Quarterly Review thought the material condition of the country was furnishing no cause for anxiety. "Our wealth is overflowing," it said, "our commercial prospects are unclouded, save by the excess of our own activity; and nothing seems likely to disturb either the peace of Europe or the profound contentment which this island is enjoying.”¹ The Times, in discussing what the ensuing twelve months were likely to bring to pass, felt “cheerful and thankful.”²

¹The Economist, March 14, 1868, supplement, "Commercial History and Review of 1867," p. 2.

²*Journal of the Statistical Society of London*, 1869, p. 82.

³*Annual Register*, 1866, p. 184.

February, however, saw severe liquidation on the stock exchange, and there were some important failures in April. On the ninth of May the Bank rate rose to nine per cent; on the tenth the failure of a firm of world-wide reputation—Overend, Gurney & Company, whose business as bill-discounters had been transferred in the preceding year to a joint-stock company with limited liability—produced terrible consternation. On the following day, Friday, great restless crowds collected in the streets, especially in the banking quarters of the city.³ The Times depicts the tumult becoming a riot by midday:

The doors of the most respectable Banking Houses were besieged, more perhaps by a mob actuated by the strange sympathy which makes and keeps a mob together than by creditors of the Banks, and throngs heaving and tumbling about Lombard street made that narrow thoroughfare impassible. The excitement on all sides was such as has not been witnessed since the great crisis of 1825, if, indeed, the memory of the few survivors who shared that Panic can be trusted when they compare it with the madness of yesterday. Nothing had happened since the day before to justify such a fear as was everywhere shown.⁴

“Black Friday” was not soon forgotten in London; other great commercial cities of the kingdom which had been affected by the news likewise had cause for remembering

¹ Quarterly Review, January, 1866, p. 250.

² The Times, January 5, 1866, editorial.

³ Vide Annual Register, 1866, chronicle, pp. 44 and 45.

⁴ The Times, May 12, 1866, editorial.

the day. The Government found it necessary to suspend the Bank Act, but the Bank of England did not extend its note issue beyond the amount permitted by the Act of 1844.¹

Unfortunately the effects of the crisis were not destined to pass away so suddenly and rapidly as the crisis itself had come. The Times vouches for the fact that nothing had happened the week before to excite universal alarm.² The Bank rate of discount was not so high as it had been again and again in the last three years, and though the glories of finance companies had begun to pale, and it was known that the Imperial Mercantile Association was tottering, there was no reason to apprehend any panic in consequence of a collapse which was distinctly foreseen.³ It had been the suspension of Overend, Gurney & Company on the tenth of May which awoke the terror of the creditors. The name of the firm was historical, and the magnitude of its liabilities would tend to show that the mass of depositors had confidence in the public company with limited liability. But the influence of the panic was to be seen through many of the succeeding months. Two or three banks failed within the week.⁴ The rate of ten per cent discount which was imposed on the Bank of England as a condition of the additional power of issue lasted from the eleventh of May to the seventeenth of August; and when the rate did decline from eight to six, to five, to four per cent, the price of the Funds and of shares in railway and joint-stock companies scarcely rose at all. Moreover, an intense foreign ¹ By the Bank Charter Act of 1844 (the 7 and 8 Vict., c. 32) issues of the Bank were to be covered by bullion, three-fourths in gold, except for £14,000,000 covered by Government securities.

² The Times, May 15, 1866, editorial.

³ Ibid.

⁴ Annual Register, 1866, p. 184.

distrust¹ of every English signature was engendered by the suspension of the Bank Act. Lord Clarendon's circular² to British Embassies and Legations throughout Europe, explaining the distinction between scarcity of money and insolvency, and giving as the causes of the panic overspeculation due to prosperity, the derangement in commercial transactions produced by events on the Continent, which hindered a return to a sound state in monetary matters, and as immediate cause the stoppage of the great discount house of Overend, Gurney & Company did little to check the prevailing suspicion.³

So bad was the situation that the royal speech at the prorogation of Parliament on August 10 expressed great concern over the monetary pressure which had weighed upon the interests of the country so long; and although on the first of October the Times was still optimistic, claiming that in spite of all commercial troubles people had been well employed and the rate of wages had permitted the masses to live well,⁴ by the latter part of November complaint was heard in this newspaper:

Trade is slack. Wherever we turn this is the report which meets us. Whether it be the hardware of Birmingham or the soft goods of Yorkshire, the flax-spinning of Scotland or the mining industry of the West, which is the subject of inquiry, the answer is the same monotonous croak. There is little or nothing doing. Bankers won't look at new and promising investments. Merchants are inaccessible to the most glowing descriptions of untried foreign and colonial markets. Stocks hang on hand and accumulate in spite of all the care of pro-

¹ The Economist, March 9, 1867, supplement, p. 5.

² To be found in the Times, May 22, 1866. Lord Clarendon was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

³ Annual Register, 1866, p. 184.

⁴ The Times, October 1, 1866, editorial.

ducers and warehousemen to keep them low. Towards the end of the month slight demand for money arises, but it is only for the payment of debts when bills mature on the coming fourth. It is in no case occasioned by the growth of trade or the revival of speculation. Paris echoes the complaint of London.¹

Such was the heritage of 1867. The Annual Register points out that during this year "commerce and credit did not display their wonted elasticity" in recovering from the disasters of 1866, that a gloom was cast over the surface of society and embarrassment and distress were spread among thousands of families.² The sufferers belonged not only to the section of society classified by the Times as those who could ill afford pecuniary sacrifices or those who could find but little consolation in the discussed indirect advantages following from the bursting of commercial bubbles³ but to that section whose incomes were dependent on those investments which had greatly depreciated in value. Railway securities, for instance, became less valuable when troubles with railway property and railway management in general came as a result of the exposure in 1866 of the financial condition of the London, Chatham and Dover Company, the Great Eastern Company, and the North British Company.⁴

As an example of the unhappy influence of the panic upon private individuals, the Globe quotes that in the inland revenue department at Somerset House, where was kept a register of all those persons paying duty on carriages

¹ The Times, November 28, 1866, editorial.

² Annual Register, 1867, p. 202.

³ The Times, December 31, 1866, editorial.

⁴ The Economist, October 19, 1867, under the article "Railways," discusses the depreciation in value of railway property.

and horses, 1600 persons in less than two months gave notice of the intention to discontinue keeping their carriages.¹ Even traveling was checked somewhat, we read,² and places of public amusement were less resorted to.

A more intimate knowledge of the latter part of 1866 and of 1867, however, can be gained from reports on trade. The official tables of exports and imports seem to testify to a continued expansion of foreign trade for 1866.³ And it is true that the amount of commerce carried on was still immense and growing, but it was not increasing with that percentage of augmentation which marked the preceding year. The real truth may be disguised too easily by looking at the trade figures for the year and refusing to note the effect of trade during the early months upon the total: a comparison of the returns for 1866 month by month with those of the preceding year shows no great increase during the latter part of 1866. In fact, there was a diminution in percentage of augmentation.⁴ 1867, moreover, saw no improvement over 1866.

The reports on the condition of the leading trades as given in the Economist were discouraging. In the cotton industry—outside of the first seven months of 1866 when the supply of raw cotton was in excess of the demand, while the demand for the manufactured article fully equalled the supply—the high price of the raw material, together with the slackened demand for goods, kept England's largest branch of the manufacturing industry in a fluctuating,

¹ The Globe, February 2, 1868—cited in the Economist, March 14, 1868, supplement, p. 2.

² Annual Register, 1866, p. 185.

³ For a discussion on revenue returns, vide R. D. Baxter, National Income (London, 1868), p. 28; for graphs, vide Bowley, England's Foreign Trade.

⁴ Cf. Accounts and Papers, 1867 (46-xii) lxxv, 607, 629.

feverish and unprofitable state. 1867 opened with a general adoption of short time as the only mode of enabling the manufacturers to keep in check the price of the raw material, and to clear their warehouses of unsold goods. Trade throughout the year remained unsatisfactory both to the importers of raw material and to the exporters of the manufactured articles.

The iron industry—next to the cotton trade the most important industry of the country—likewise felt the depressing influences which were generally prevailing. There was a decline in prices of articles in 1866 and a demand insufficient to keep the works going full time; the great disorganization of the home demand, consequent on the commercial crisis, and the disrepute falling on railways and other companies, explained in part the condition. In 1867 the iron trade was dull and unsatisfactory, and the general course of prices, at least to the middle of the year, tended downward.

In the linen trade the year 1866 was the worst which had been experienced for some years past, and the dullness and inactivity which prevailed at the close of 1866 and which led to a partial stoppage of flax-spinning machinery, continued throughout 1867; and, if the descriptions of the condition of other industries such as the chemical trade, the leather trade, the woolen trade, were somewhat more favorable in 1866, the reports of 1867 presented expressions of hope for the coming year rather than of rejoicing over the past.

Other events there were which add little to the good reputation of these two years. The cattle plague, which during the earlier months had not been checked, was proving so ruinous to farmers and graziers, especially to those of the northwestern counties, that many an ancient pasture had to be given up. The money loss for 1866 due to the disease was computed at not less than £3,500,000.¹ The Government found it necessary to act. It prohibited markets and fairs for the sale of lean and store cattle, and, among other regulations, gave the local authorities power to kill animals which had been exposed to contagion. Some compensation was to be given to the owners. Again, the Austro-Prussian War disorganized and checked Continental trade. Prospects of war had a bad influence on the market some time before the actual declaration. Some of the reports to the Economist placed a considerable amount of blame upon the Continental situation for the English trade conditions.

Two other events, not strictly economic, helped to depress the public: the activity of the Fenians,² who were causing so much disquietude that Parliament in February, 1866, passed a bill for the suspension of the habeas corpus act in Ireland, and the presence of cholera, which, though not causing many deaths, was alarming, especially in the eastern parts of London, during the latter part of July and the first of August.

Gloomy enough, then, is a general description of economic conditions during the period of the Reform agitation,³ yet it is only by going to the statistician that there can be found the definite statement concerning the condition of that class to which the Reform bill was to give the franchise. His figures on prices, wages, and unemployment must tell much concerning the workingman. In his attempt to get the desired material, to piece together from here and from there the economic history of the nineteenth century

¹ Annual Register, 1866, p. 182.

² The word is derived from an old Irish word meaning "champion of Ireland." The aim of the Fenians was to throw off British rule.

³ This is described in chap. iii.

he has had to expend much energy;¹ and the information obtained, he may warn,² gives only general trends and is not to be used carelessly for fine distinctions. Nevertheless, the results of his work, supplemented by more or less typical accounts taken directly from contemporary writers, give the best account now available for the years 1866 and 1867.

PRICES

Difficulty is met at once when data on retail prices are sought. Investigations on this topic have, as yet, made little headway³ although material upon wholesale prices is at hand for this portion of the nineteenth century. The following cases, however, chosen more or less at random, will make clear the trend of retail prices. The London Times for July 10, 1866, gives the following data regarding the cost of living for workingmen in Lancashire:

The clamor among operatives of Lancashire for increased wages is no doubt attributable principally to the great rise that has taken place during the past three years in the price of provisions. This rise is illustrated by the following facts: seven men of the county constabulary have for some years lodged at a certain house in Preston, the whole joining in a common stock of provisions, and each at the end of the week paying his proportion of the cost. As an accurate record has been kept of all provisions consumed, and the price paid for each article, they are enabled to make an exact comparison of the weekly cost per head during the whole of the time they have lived together. In the first week of July, 1863, the cost was 7s. 8d; of July, 1864, 7s. 11d.; of July, 1865, 8s. 5d.; of July, 1866, 9s. 5d. . . . Food in July last was hence about twelve per cent cheaper than at present and in 1863 about twenty-two and one-half per cent cheaper. As cloggers, cobblers, shoemakers, tailors, dressmakers, etc. all raised their prices immediately the factory operatives obtained their recent advanced wages (from five to ten per cent), it is more than probable that with the present price of food, and the increased charges for nearly all other necessities, they are not so well off as they were in 1863 or even last year at this time.¹

¹ Vide Mr. A. L. Bowley's discussion of Mr. Wood's paper in the Royal Statistical Society Journal, vol. lxxiii (1910), pp. 626-629, for a statement of the difficulties which the statistician has had to overcome in compiling his information.

² Vide A. L. Bowley, in the Royal Statistical Society Journal, vol. lxi (1906), "The Statistics of Wages in the Nineteenth Century."

³ Vide Mr. G. H. Wood in the Royal Statistical Society Journal, vol. lxxv (1902) under the article "The Investigation of Retail Prices," p. 685.

In the Parliamentary Reports of 1889² is to be found specially supplied to the Board of Trade the annual balance sheet of a working cabinet-maker. Housekeeping cost £1 4s. 3d. a week in 1865, £1 7s. in 1866, and £1 11s. in 1867. Notable advances took place in the prices of bread, some kinds of meat, and beer. A summary shows that in this particular household the item including rent, taxes, water, was very high in 1866 but that much less was spent for clothing during the year than in either 1865 or 1867.³ Retail prices of bread as taken from the Greenwich Hospital bread prices show the effect of the poor harvests mentioned above.⁴ A four-pound loaf sold for 5½d. in 1865, for 6d. in 1866 and for 8d. in 1867. A detailed statement of retail prices of provisions can be obtained from extracts from the books of a Mr. George Dix, grocer and general dealer, as given by Brassey:⁵

¹The Times, July 10, 1866.

²*Accounts and Papers*, 1889, (c-5861) lxxxiv.

³The wages earned were less in 1866 than in 1865 and 1867.

⁴*Journal of the Royal Statistical Society*, vol. lxxv (1902), p. 690.

⁵Thomas B. Brassey, On Work and Wages, 3rd edition (London, 1872), pp. 164 and 165.

TABLE A

	1864			1865			1866			1867
	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.	£.	s.	d.
Flour per sack.	1	8	0	1	10	0	1	14	6	2	0	6
Cheese per lb.	0	0	8	0	0	8½	0	0	10	0	0	9
Butter " "	0	1	4	0	1	5	0	1	6	0	1	3½
Bacon " "	0	0	8	0	0	9	0	0	9	0	0	8
Tea " "	0	3	8	0	3	8	0	3	8	0	3	6
Coffee " "	0	1	4	0	1	4	0	1	4	0	1	4
Sugar " "	0	0	5	0	0	5	0	0	5	0	0	4½
Candles " "	0	0	6¼	0	0	6	0	0	6¼	0	0	6¼
Soap " "	0	0	4½	0	0	4½	0	0	4½	0	0	4½
Beef " "	0	0	7½	0	0	8¾	0	0	8	0	0	7½
Mutton " "	0	0	8	0	0	8	0	0	8½	0	0	7½
Bread " "	0	0	1½	0	0	1¼	0	0	1¾	0	0	2

A glance at wholesale prices for the period confirms the impression of the increasing cost of living obtained from retail prices. The index numbers used to represent 1866 as given in the Economist and elsewhere must be understood to take into consideration the prices of raw materials of manufacture. The great drop in cotton, flax, etc., from the end of May on, therefore, will greatly affect the index number representing prices for the year although the condition of the workingmen may not be much bettered by the change in these articles.¹ In such a case a table as the following, containing some data on those articles of food asserted by Professor Leone Levi to be necessities for the British workingman may take the place of a weighted average:

¹ Leone Levi, Wages and Earnings of the Working Classes (London, 1867), p. xxxviii, says about two-thirds of the income of workingmen was spent on food.

TABLE B¹

	Jan., 1865	Jan., 1866	June, 1866	Sept., 1866	Jan., 1867	June, 1867
Wheat per quarter ² (Gazette prices)	37s. 10d.	46s. 3d.	47s. 5d.	49s. 7d.	60s. 2d.	65s. 5d.
Beef per 8 lbs. ² (Inferior middlings) ..	42d. ³	36d.	44d.	48d.	44d.	44d.
Mutton per 8 lbs. ² (Middling)	50d. ³	52d.	56d.	60d.	48d.	50d.
Pork per 8 lbs. ²	52d. ³	58d.	56d.	56d.	40d.	46d.
Sugar per cwt. (Bengal good)	24s. ³	27s.	24s.	23s. 6d.	24s. 6d.	24s. 6d.
Tea per lb.	9½d. ³	12d.	12d.	10½d.	9½d.	6d.
Butter per cwt.	119s.	123s.	123s.	115s.	115s.	115s.
Bacon per cwt. (Hamburg)	54s.	61s.	62s.	71s.	71s.
Barley per quarter. ²	28s. 5d. ⁴	32s. 9d.	35s. 1d.	37s. 2d.	44s. 3d.	36s. 2d.

The preceding pages seem to show that Wood⁵ has not gone astray in representing average retail prices in 1866 and 1867 by higher index numbers than those used for the preceding years.⁶

But it is obvious that prices taken by themselves cannot mean anything. The real condition of the workingman can be ascertained only by additional data on wages and unemployment. If wages rise faster than prices the workingman will find himself in a more prosperous condition even though prices are soaring. What data, then, can be obtained on wages?

¹ Material for such a table can be found conveniently in the Economist.

² Professor Levi says that bread and meat absorbed the largest portion of the laborer's income devoted to food: Wages and Earnings, p. xxxix.

³ Lowest figures given are used.

⁴ Average Gazette prices (monthly) to be found in Accounts and Papers 1867-1868 (4028) lxx, 100 and 101.

⁵ Cf. Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, 1909, p. 102.

⁶ Wood shows a fall after 1867. Articles in the Economist on 1867 and 1868 seem to confirm his work.

WAGES

Unfortunately material upon this topic is not even so good as it is upon prices. The Parliamentary Accounts and Papers do give many figures concerning wages, but how difficult it is to deduce a table from them, for year-periods, can be judged only by an actual attempt to accomplish the task. As Mr. Bowley says,¹ one's impression on first taking up the question of the statistics of wages as in the cotton trade is one of simple chaos; the various lists give no guide as to hours, the rates vary from place to place, and the minute grades of occupation also vary from place to place. The statistician again warns that his work must not be accepted for fine distinctions. Nevertheless his labor may give some material on the general trend of wages. A review of the work of Bowley and Wood in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society shows² the year 1866 somewhat favorably as contrasted with 1865 or 1867. Evidently during a part of 1866 wages were rising, although a fall is seen for the year 1867. When the laborer's wages in 1886 are taken as 100, his wages in 1865, 1866, and 1867 are represented by the index numbers 87, 88, and 87 respectively. Wages of pattern-makers are represented for those years by the index numbers 152, 158, 155; ironmoulders by 166, 166, 166; machinists 118, 122, 121; shipwrights 173, 178, 162, and so on. Index numbers of average rates in engineering and shipbuilding in nineteen districts³ give about the same results. Likewise when actual figures are used in place of index numbers, the above data is upheld. Weekly wages of all workpeople in the cotton industry during the three years averaged 144, 157, and 158d.¹ The Accounts and Papers, in showing the wages of carpenters and joiners for the years 1862 to 1890, give the following for 1865, 1866 and 1867: 24s., 26s., 26s.² According to Bowley in Wages in the United Kingdom, Scotch brewers received 4s. 1d., 4s. 6d., 4s. 1¼d. daily.³ Webb's Industrial Democracy gives the average standard rate of wages per week of a stonemason at Glasgow, as 28s. 6d. (1865), 27s. 7d. (1866), 28s. 8d. (1867); and the standard rate of wages of compositors in London per week as 33s., 36s., 36s.⁴ The quarters of wheat purchasable with the wages in each case is given as 0.68, 0.55, and 0.45; 0.79, 0.72, 0.55. Provided a workingman lived entirely on bread his condition was much worse in 1866 and 1867 even though his wages had increased somewhat.

¹ Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, vol. lxxiii (1910), pp. 626-627.

² Ibid. tables, vol. lxxix (1906), pp. 174-175.

³ Ibid., pp. 162 et seq. Vide also average figures from seventeen sets of workingmen, vol. lxxii (1899), pp. 664-665.

The facts so far given do not, of course, tell what part of the year 1866 caused the increased index number for wages. For any changes which took place during any months of the year, we must go to the newspapers, weekly and daily. And they cannot be expected to give the exact statistical information desired.

The year opened under favorable auspices, according to the Fortnightly Review; ⁵ in the issue of May first, comment is made upon the prosperity and the content of the mass of the people, the general rise of wages and the better understanding between capital and labor, and finally, the lack of response on the part of the workingman, because there was not distress in the country, to the attempts to

¹ Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, vol. lxxiii (1910), p. 599.

² Accounts and Papers, 1890-91 (c-6475) xcii, 504.

³ A. L. Bowley, Wages in the United Kingdom in the Nineteenth Century (Cambridge, 1900), p. 105.

⁴ Webb, Sidney and Beatrice, Industrial Democracy (London, 1902), appendix iii.

⁵ Fortnightly Review, vol. iv, p. 756.

arouse him for Reform. The Times here and there substantiates the opinion that wages were rising. We read of the London carpenters and joiners receiving an extra half-penny per hour on the existing rate of wages, or 8d. per hour.¹ We read² that in North and East Lancashire an extensive agitation was going on regarding wages and hours of labor—a movement confining itself to no particular class but permeating all sections, “from scavengers up to sub-editors, and from high-class artisans down to ‘half-penny shavers’ and washer-women.” And while some of the claimants received no concessions and realized no improvements, either in reference to the rate of remuneration or the hours of labor, many obtained almost all they sought for. At Preston, for instance, all the operative weavers received an advance of ten per cent upon the standard list of prices; the spinners and minders likewise obtained an increased rate of remuneration; the printers were given an advance of wages, ranging from 2s. to 4s. or 5s. per week. The shoemakers had to remain out for three days and then obtained the extra money they had demanded; the stonemasons were on strike for a month before they were able to get the reduction of hours which they asked for, and the joiners and the flaggers and slaters were, at the writing, still on strike, the former for more money, the latter for certain alterations in their rules. Some wanted increases in wages, which they did not get—the scavengers for instance, and the warehousemen in the employ of the North Union Railway Company. Many barbers who had charged ½d. for a single shave demanded and received 1d. The washerwomen, too, in some of the East Lancashire towns tried to secure an advance of wages. At Bacup the painters were striking for an advance of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ per hour; at Accrington the shoemakers received an increase; at Blackburn the plumbers and glaziers and some factory operatives were on strike, and the stonemasons were demanding fewer hours; at Chorley the weavers had their wages raised and yet were not content.

¹ Vide the Times, April 19; a discussion on the subject is to be found in the issues for April 26 and April 30. By May 17 most of the firms had paid the advance.

² A résumé is to be found in the Times, June 22.

In contrast to the upward trend of wages during the first half of the year, however, a trend in the opposite direction will be found during the later months. The Economist mentions¹ that wages fell in 1866 in several large trades from ten to twenty per cent, and declares the most decided fall occurred in the iron trade² and iron shipbuilding trades, in the midland and northern districts. The reductions were submitted to only after protracted strikes. The strike among the ironworkers on the Tyne, Wear, and Tees lasted for nineteen weeks, from July to November, and ended in the unconditional surrender of the men. The explanation given for the change in wages was that for four or five years capital had been bidding for labor, and there was, consequently, a continuous rise of wages. Suddenly capital was paralyzed³ and now labor had to bid for capital. In the building trades, too, there came a severe check and employment was scarce.

By January, 1867,⁴ the factory operatives of North and East Lancashire were protesting against a proposed reduction of five per cent in wages; they preferred short time. Most of them apparently thought the market was over-

¹ The Economist, March 9, 1867, supplement, p. 2.

² The Times of September 12 tells of iron workers locked out for refusing to accept a reduction of ten per cent; it mentions, too, a raise given to hand mule weavers employed by one man at Preston and a reduction of hours to bricklayers.

³ That is, after the panic.

⁴ Vide the Times, January 7, 1867.

stocked, although here and there the suggestion was made that a reduction in the profits of the manufacturers and merchants might help matters. A memorial presented to the employers set forth that the five per cent conceded them in February last had been more than swallowed by increased rents, and that since that time the prices of meat, coal, and the necessities of life had been advanced to the extent of twenty-six and a half per cent. They, therefore, respectfully prayed that their wages might not be reduced, but that short time might be substituted and the market by that means surely but gradually relieved. But within a month's time a large number of men agreed to accept the reduction.¹

UNEMPLOYMENT

That the condition of the workingman was not so good after the middle of 1866 as it had been before, is probably a safe conclusion from the facts given above. That a better detailed knowledge of his condition could be obtained if we knew something definite about unemployment will not be disputed. Anything like exact and final figures on unemployment cannot, of course, be obtained. Mr. Wood in articles² in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, however, has been able to tell something concerning the progress made by the workingman since 1860 by tracing the percentage of unemployed as shown by the records of the more important trade unions.³ His results⁴ show that

¹ Vide the Times, January 9, January 15, January 17.

² Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, vol. lxii (1899) and vol. lxiii (1900).

³ Vide also an article by E. L. Hartley in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, vol. lxvii (1904), where marriage and pauperism are suggested as tests for unemployment and also diagram on this by Wood, vol. lxii, in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, p. 660.

⁴ Mr. Wood, in the Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, vol. lxii, p. 643, has something to say concerning the understatement of the evil in the fifth report on trade unions.

1866 was not so favorable a year as was 1865, and that 1867 was much worse in unemployment than was 1866. Whether the average percentage of members in want of employment be used or the average expenditure per head on unemployed and traveling benefit, the conclusion is much the same. The Registrar-General's Report gives a decrease in pauperism for the March and June quarters of 1866 as compared with the same period of 1865 but an increase in 1866 over 1865 for the December quarter. And the opening months of 1867 show a great increase over the corresponding months¹ of 1866. Written pictures of pauperism as given to the Times suggest, moreover, a much worse condition than the actual statistics show. Statistics cannot tell the whole truth because many workingmen were unwilling to receive parish relief not only because such a course of action would tend to break down their self-respect but because it would disqualify them from taking advantage of benefits connected with their trade and friendly societies. On the other hand, the descriptions of the newspapers may be too gloomy. Yet there can be found in the Times, almost at random, during the period of greatest stress, letters depicting the condition in London :

At certain doors of those districts (waterside districts of East London) are to be seen daily, crowds of men jostling, striving, almost fighting, for admission—to what? . . . to gain the privilege of breaking hard stones for two or three hours in a cold muddy yard attached to the parish workhouse, for the reward of threepence and a loaf of bread.

These men, too, are not clad in the usual stoneyard apparel, they wear good coats—rags are scarcely to be seen. They are men who, not very long ago, were earning from 18s. to £2 weekly, to whom the very mention of the workhouse would have been contamination; and here they struggle and wrestle for its most meagre advantages.

¹1867 as a whole had a worse record than 1866.

There are many other parishes, I believe, similarly situated.¹

The Lord Mayor, calling the attention of a meeting of bankers, merchants, magistrates and others to the prevailing distress among the laboring population in the eastern part of London, said:

Mr. Jeffries, the relieving officer for the South District, . . . reported the total number of persons relieved out of the house that week was 8,319, being an increase on that of the corresponding week of last year of 5,453. . . . A gentleman residing in the West Indies road, writing on Sunday last, states that he had visited many of the working people at their houses in that neighborhood, and that the distress among the mechanics and laborers is appalling. Many of them, he says, are quite disheartened, sitting within bare walls, with neither bed nor clothing and with their children almost naked and famishing. Strong young men had burst into tears on seeing him enter, and pointed to their starving wives and children in silent despair. Some among them had been very improvident; but others quite the reverse. He had that day relieved a young man with four children, who was an ironworker, and had been out of employment for many months. He was a teetotaller, and husbanded his saved earnings to the last, and now, with his family, had nothing to lie upon but the bare floors, and nothing to cover them but a single sheet. The writer adds that he could fill a volume with cases of like destitution and that he fears the late conduct of the Shipwrights' Union at the Thames Ironworks will do much harm and subject many innocent persons to suffering.

The Rector of Bethnal Green writes that there is a great deal of distress there; that the commercial panic, the cholera, and the frost have severely affected the working classes; that the rates are now in the proportion of 8s. in the pound a year; that the workhouse is full, every spare space being occupied by a bed; and that on Tuesday last eight hours were spent in inquiring into the outdoor cases. . . . The Secretary of the Docks and Wharfs Laborer's Association, High Street, Shadwell, writing on Saturday last, thinks he may safely say 20,000 of those classes are now quite out of employment and had not earned a shilling for the last two months; that probably 15,000 of them are dragging out a miserable existence by pledging little things and selling articles of furniture. . . . Another correspondent writes: "Sickening and heartrending have been the scenes of distress I have witnessed during my four months' voluntary employment of doing what I could, in my humble degree, to assist in alleviating the misery of some of my fellow creatures. Upwards of 500 families during that time have been brought under my notice, and I can unhesitatingly affirm such a season of distress and misery was never before experienced in the locality." He adds that during all the summer months, owing to the scarcity of work and the visitation of cholera, many families had to part with articles of clothing, bedding and everything upon which money could be obtained, so that when winter set in they had nothing left to dispose of, and the pawnbrokers, whose shops are already crammed with goods, care but to give the merest trifle. . . . Now the distress was fearfully and palpably developed by the continuance of cold weather. To particularize cases of distress, he says, is almost beyond his power. It is widespread and almost universal.¹

¹ The Times, January 12, 1867.

The January return of the Poor Law Board showed the large amount of distress in England elsewhere than in London.² In the northmidland division, the district least affected, the number of persons in receipt of relief was only 2.7 per cent more than in the corresponding period of 1866,

¹ The Times, January 22, 1867.

² Vide statement of the Rev. Rowsell in the Times, February 7, 1867.

but in the southwest division the increase was 4.4 per cent, in Wales 4.6 per cent, in Yorkshire 5.3 per cent, in the south-midland division 6.1 per cent, in the northern 8.8 per cent, in the westmidland 11.4 per cent, in the southeastern 12.6 per cent, in the northwestern 27.4 per cent, and in the metropolis 72.6 per cent.¹

Thus the data on prices, wages and unemployment—necessarily rather vague—suggest that the period when Reform was being made an important public question was a time of serious economic difficulty for the people who were to be affected by a change in the franchise law. Additional material, not statistical, showing that it was a period of gloom is not lacking. For instance, the Economist says:

In our review of 1866, we said that the year had "left behind it sinister influences which will penetrate far into '67, or perhaps into '68" and the events of the last twelve months have confirmed this expectation. Nearly the whole of 1867 has been occupied in converting the mistakes which preceded, and retrieving, as far as possible, the losses which were inflicted by the crisis of 1866. The year has been, therefore, throughout its whole course, a period of arrangements, liquidations, compromises, retrenched expenditure, circumscribed trade, and general indisposition to trust the future. It has been a year of strict supervision of all elements of cost—a year of declining wages and of stern comparisons between English and Foreign capabilities of commanding neutral customers.²

Elsewhere it speaks of 1866 and 1867 as two dark years—the period of rough discipline. The tone of these circulars already referred to, which were sent to the Economist to give information concerning various trades for the year 1866 is almost without exception unfavorable. The writers, each speaking of facts of his particular business, complained of expectations unfulfilled, losses incurred and former relations of trade broken up. The report on the cotton trade begins with this statement:¹ "From nearly every point of view regarding the material interests of the country, the past year has been one of the most disastrous on record;" the report on the linen trade with this:

¹ Cf. the Times, April 16, 1867.

² The Economist, March 14, 1868, supplement, "Commercial History and Review of 1867," p. 1.

In reviewing the progress of our staple trade during 1866, we regret that we cannot continue the same favorable account of it as we had to give in our last annual circular, the year that has just expired having *been the worst*² that has been experienced for some years back, especially to those engaged in the spinning trade;

the one on the woolen trade with this:³

The year which has just closed will be long remembered, not only in this district, but in the country at large, as one of the most disastrous in the present century. The severe and, perhaps, unprecedented monetary panic, the Austro-Prussian war, cholera, deficient harvest, and the strikes in the iron trade, have all combined to restrict the natural operations of business, and entailed loss and inconvenience on nearly every class of the community; and the one on the iron trade with this: "The Iron trade has been in an unsatisfactory condition throughout the year, prices of all descriptions having steadily declined, whilst the demand has been insufficient to keep the works going full time." Sir Robert Giffen, at one time president of the Royal

¹ These quotations are to be found in the Economist, March 9, 1867, supplement.

² The original is in italics.

³ The report from Bradford; the report from Leeds has a more cheerful tone, although reports from Huddersfield and Halifax show the effects of the panic.

Statistical Society and also chief of the statistical department of the Board of Trade, although believing that the trade depression of this period came entirely from a very moderate change as compared with a period of prosperity, speaks of this as a time when "men's hearts were failing them for fear of what the consequences of the great panic of 1866 might be." Writing sometime afterwards he expressed himself in his *Essays in Finance*¹ as recollecting no period when trade was spoken of in more desponding terms than it was in 1867. "The city was dull," he states, "as every one said, beyond all previous experience, with money at two per cent for an unprecedented time; a remarkable article appeared in the Edinburgh Review, discussing the strike of capital; no symptom was wanting to what is called a marked period of depression."

And now arises the important question: did the period of depression help stir up discontent against the existing conditions; could the Reformers make use of distress to cause those who cared little for Reform in prosperity to demand it in adversity? Did the writer judge correctly when he said: "The country clamors for Reform—Parliamentary Reform—Reform somehow. Something is felt by Great British starvation to be vitally wrong?"²

There can be little doubt, indeed, that the commercial panic and the subsequent period of depression did much to awaken the nation. As the Westminster Review pointed out:

When a commercial panic brings disturbance to trade and industry, then the evils of pauperism and crime in their more aggravated form excite attention, and the community are hurried into hasty and spasmodic action. The financial disasters of 1866 have been felt through the whole community, but more severely by the humbler orders who have to depend upon precarious employments. The ranks of the pauper classes have been swollen, and the burthens upon the rates and upon every kind of public and private charity are heavier than they have been for many preceding years.¹

¹ Sir Robert Giffen, Essays in Finance, 2nd series (New York, 1886), pp. 2 and 3.

² W. F. Stanley, Proposition for a New Reform Bill (London, 1867), p. 6.

That the "humbler orders" and the working class as a whole, might be stirred by economic pressure even to demand political privileges, was a possibility remarked upon by the Spectator:

It is quite possible,—we desire carefully to guard ourselves against any positive anticipation—but it is quite possible, that Parliament has postponed this Reform question one year too long, and will have to settle it during a season of very considerable popular distress, and therefore of earnest popular agitation. The reports which come in from all sides are not very reassuring. The Iron Trade is in deep trouble, so deep that the best organized Union in England, that of the Southern Ironworkers, has accepted a blank reduction of ten per cent, which at another time would have encountered sharp resistance, and that men who were thought to be millionaires find finance their most serious occupation. Bread, though not positively "dear," according to the ante-Free-Trade standard of prices, is very much dearer than it has been, and the average rate of wages has not yet adjusted itself fully to the slow but visible rise of prices. Agricultural laborers still swarm to the towns. The emigration towards the great cities has been of late so rapid that the number of men outside the regular grooves of labor is large, and it is on these men that pressure falls with its first severity. Finally, the effects of the "panic" have at last reached down to the lowest class, the sediment, as it were, of our reservoirs of labor. . . . A contractor refuses all but the least riskful enterprise. This does not ruin his best workmen, who have savings and are indeed seldom discharged, but it presses terribly on vast classes beneath them, on the unskilled laborers in particular. Add to these causes temporary circumstances, like the suspension of river traffic, great fleets unable to enter the Thames, the quarrel in the ship building trade, on the merit of which the public is, we suspect, still misinformed,—and the cessation of dockyard labor, and we can readily understand that there have been “bread riots” in Liverpool, and terrible distress in the riverine parishes of London. In Greenwich, Deptford, and Poplar this distress has taken a dangerous form, almost threatening large masses of human lives. There are said to be 30,000 “shipwrights,” but rather shipwright’s laborers and dockyard people, out of work, exclusive of the number always thrown out by a frost, of new immigrants, and of the wives and families of all these persons. The poorhouses are full beyond the possibility of receiving more, and “liberal out-door relief,” the usual panacea, involves this terrible difficulty. It means additional taxation upon parishes already so heavily taxed that every additional shilling in the pound throws hundreds of self-supporting persons upon alms. Thousands of bakers, pork-butchers, green-grocers, and petty linendrapers are dependent on these ship laborers, and of course can get nothing from them at present, are compelled in fact, at once by policy and feeling, to be as lenient as they dare. They struggle on, often amid real deprivation, eating one meal a day, and so on, and imploring forbearance from the larger dealers who supply them, but any peremptory demand for cash overweights them at once. They have not got it, and they cannot get it, and they sink.¹

¹ Westminster Review, April, 1869. p. 438.

Others there were, like the chairman at the meeting of dock laborers, a meeting called to consider the hard times, who stated distinctly that nothing could be done until the working classes had a money interest with the capitalists and until, as a class, the workmen were represented in Parliament.¹ The "commercial morality" of the business class was to blame for 1866's great disaster, said one of England's magazines;² and the Beehive,³ the official organ of the trade unions, was quick to declare that workmen's representatives in the House of Commons would soon make it known that the present terrible situation was due to the capitalists and the middle class, that portion of the country political powerful. With a few such representatives in the House public opinion on the subject of trade unions would be revolutionized, and (it continued) the fallacy of the cry of "Tradesunions driving trade to foreign countries" ¹ would speedily be shown, and the real object of that cry—the reduction of wages, that employers may still keep up their enormous profits to maintain the luxury and extravagance indulged in, if not by themselves personally, by their families—mercilessly exposed. With a few such men in the House, the ridiculous and miserably false statement, that the present stagnation of trade, and distress of the unemployed workmen, had been brought about by Trades-Unions and strikes, would be exposed and scattered to the winds, and the real cause would be made patent to the world—viz., the late monetary panic, brought about by the reckless over-trading,

¹ The Spectator, January 26.

¹ The Times, January 29, 1867.

² The North British Review.

³ The Beehive, a weekly organ of the trade-union world, was published from 1861 to 1877 under the editorship of George Potter. Because of the contributions of such writers as Frederic Harrison, E. S. Beesly, and other friends of trade unionism, it became, Mr. Sidney Webb says, the best labor newspaper which has yet appeared, and is of the greatest possible value to the student of trade-union history. Unfortunately there is to be found no complete file. So far as can be discovered, Mr. John Burns is the only person possessing a set for the years 1865, 1866, and 1867.

⁴ Articles or letters on this topic appeared frequently at this time.

fraudulent speculations, Stock Exchange gambling, bank and company swindling, and general cupidity, avarice, and roguery of a large portion of the capitalists and middle classes, all eager to get rich by any other than honorable and legitimate means.¹

The pamphleteers, too, agreed with the Beehive. One declared that the present unsatisfactory condition of every branch of trade and industry throughout the country was due to bad currency and money laws which the House of Commons did not tend to;—but, “were the Directors and other Proprietors of the (so-called) ‘Bank of England’ losers by monetary panics, in the ratio that they have been gainers by them, the Public may be quite certain that monetary panics would not occur.”² Another placed the blame for the increase of pauperism upon the panic of 1866 and the depression of trade which in turn was due to the lack of honesty and prudence in the management of the great public undertakings in which a large portion of the savings of the country was formerly invested.³ Another gave his explanation of the situation:

The working-classes, through their organ, the Beehive, are perfectly aware of the injury “Monetary Panics” periodically inflict upon them, often depriving them partially or wholly of that employment by which alone they can obtain bread for themselves and families; and they also well know that the cause of such panics are our Currency laws, commonly called Bank laws, which were made by the wealthy to suit their own purposes. If the working-classes are told upon authority that these laws cannot be altered because it is necessary that the Bank of England should have in its coffers a huge mass of gold coin and bullion, in order to enable the importer of foreign goods to pay his creditor in gold when the Exchanges are against us, they will naturally ask, Why such necessity? Why not trust to the laws of supply and demand? Then the truth will come out. It is not that the law of supply and demand would not always enable the importer of foreign goods to obtain whatever gold he required, but he might occasionally have to pay for it, in which case he would have to charge a higher price to his wealthy customers, whether lords or ladies, who would therefore have to pay more for their expensive wines, laces, silks, velvets, and other luxuries; and, rather than such an event, it is far better that the country should be periodically inflicted with "Monetary Panics," and the working-classes deprived wholly or in part of that employment by which alone they can obtain bread for themselves and families! How long can such injustice prevail? ¹

¹ The quotation can be found in Blackwood's, February, 1867.

² Richard Dover, Progress versus Collapse (Westminster, 1869).

³ John Noble, Free Trade, Reciprocity and the Revivers (London, 1867), p. 38.

So important was the economic aspect of the question that the opponents of Reform effectively argued that the working classes would use their political power, when obtained, for their own selfish economic and social interests. Thus the Times summed up the feeling of the pessimists, although it professed not to take this gloomy view itself:

Almost universally without the first elements of political knowledge it is readily concluded that they will use the franchise for the objects which animal life or their social condition will enable them to appreciate. They are hard-worked and ill-fed, so their cry at the hustings will be for eight hours instead of nine, and sixpence more a day. They are envious, and they will want to have divided among them the land and the incomes of their more fortunate neighbors. They want employment so that they will ask for infinite paper money, to keep up enterprise.²

¹ Rigby Wason, The Currency Question (London, 1869), pp. 24 and 25.

² The Times, May 23, 1867.

Indeed, to those students of History who believe that many of the agitations for reforms, which stirred England at various times during the nineteenth century, were brought about by a discontent arising from economic conditions, the foregoing pages will tend to suggest that here again a period of stress had decisive influence upon the popular attitude toward Parliamentary Reform.

CHAPTER III

THE POPULAR ATTITUDE TOWARD REFORM

THE demand for Reform "from without" had been of little importance during the early 'sixties. The bill of 1860 had to be abandoned and no new bill was brought in by the Government because of the apathy of the nation. So said Lord John Russell. In a speech in Parliament in March, 1861, and again in a speech at Blairgowrie in September, 1863, he admitted that a strong feeling existed in the country against changes in the system of representation.¹ Lord Palmerston, in explaining his opposition to Mr. Locke King's County Franchise bill of 1864, said,² "I hardly think it was expedient for my honorable friend to bring forward his bill at the present juncture, for it is plain that there does not now exist the same anxiety for organic change that was observable some time ago."

Those who were indifferent to Parliamentary Reform could point out that in 1860 there were no petitions in its favor; in 1861 there were fourteen, signed by 2225 persons; in 1862 there were two, signed by 1097; and in 1863 there were no petitions.³ The middle classes were in power; their political and economic wants were satisfied and they troubled themselves very little about the working classes.

¹ Vide Hansard, vol. clxi, pp. 1920-1926, and J. H. Murchison, The Conservatives and "Liberals," p. xi.

² Joseph Irving, The Annals of Our Time (London, 1875).

³ Cf. Mr. Whiteside's speech, April 13, 1864, in Hansard, vol. clxxv, p. 331.

And even these "humbler neighbors,"¹ as they were called, were fairly prosperous—for them. Agitation was checked, however, not only because of the influence of good harvests, increasing trade, and rising wages, but also because of the influence of Lord Palmerston,² that typical mid-Victorian gentleman who was at the head of the Liberal ministry. He and Lord Derby, leader of the Opposition, were in agreement upon this question of Reform; both were willing to "rest and be thankful." Lord John Russell summed up the situation as follows:

With regard to domestic policy I think we [i. e., Liberals under Palmerston and Conservatives under Derby] are all pretty much agreed, because the feeling of the country and of those who have conducted great reforms is very much like that of a man, who, having made a road in your own [Scottish] highlands, put a stone on the top mountain with an inscription, "Rest and be thankful." That seems to be very much like our feeling, not that there are not other roads to make and other mountains to climb; but it seems to be the feeling of the country, in which I cannot help joining, that our own policy is rather to "rest and be thankful" than to make new roads.³

The nation at large was conversant with this attitude of Lord Palmerston and knew that there was little chance for an agitation to be successful, but here and there respectable newspapers and magazines⁴ and even men⁵ of good standing at times averred that some of the more intelligent workmen were anxious for the franchise; anything like

¹ Term of Westminster Review, April, 1865, p. 529.

² Cf. views of Quarterly Review, July, 1865.

³ Murchison, op. cit., p. xi. Vide, also, Sir Spencer Walpole, The Life of Lord John Russell, 2 vols. (London, 1889, 2nd edition), vol. ii, p. 402.

⁴ Letter to the Times, May 11, 1865; Frazer's, August, 1865.

⁵ Reference to Messrs. Baines, Locke King, Bright, Forster, etc.

household suffrage was not taken seriously by either of the great parties.

In the spring of 1865 there were a number of Reform meetings held in various cities of the Kingdom, probably with the purpose of trying to commit one party or the other on this question in the coming elections. Some of the speakers criticized ¹ the House of Commons and the leaders of both parties as having failed to fulfill the pledges solemnly given to the country six years before; others made known no lesser expectations than universal manhood suffrage and the redistribution of seats. In an effort to make the whole question as important as possible the Reformers organized the Reform League under the leadership of which most of the agitation for the next two or three years was to be carried on. The following notice giving definite information as to the purpose and organization of the League appeared in the London Times for February 21, 1865:

[A new Reform Association—For some weeks past negotiations have been on foot between a body of influential gentlemen, members of Parliament and others, and several of the leaders among the working classes in the metropolis, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the working men are really desirous of obtaining the franchise, and, if so, whether the existing organizations of the working classes could be made available for furthering a measure of Reform which would accomplish that object. Among other gentlemen who have taken a deep interest in the movement may be enumerated the following members of Parliament: Messrs. Cobden, Bright, Forster, etc., and also several well-known public men, such as Mr. Samuel Morley, Mr. E. Beales, Mr. T. B. Potter, Mr. Mason Jones, etc. These gentlemen state that they are prepared, if they see the working classes themselves moving earnestly in the matter, to put down a sum of £5,000 to carry on the agitation. The result of these negotiations has been the sending out by a committee of working men of a circular to upwards of 250 representative men among the working classes, comprising the secretaries and officers of the principal trades, friendly, and other working-class organizations, requesting them to attend a meeting at St. Martin's-hall, on Tuesday evening next. Should that meeting respond to the appeal thus made, a deputation will be appointed from it to meet the gentlemen above named on an early day to make the necessary arrangements for establishing the association, which it is intended shall be inaugurated by a great public meeting at one of the large metropolitan halls, over which a leading Liberal member will preside, supported by a large number of the advanced Liberal members of Parliament. An important part of the programme will be the appointment of sub-committees in each metropolitan borough, whose especial duty it will be to watch the election and the candidates who may offer themselves, with a view to obtain the return of members who will honestly carry out the principles of the association, viz., the extension of the franchise to the working classes. The exact basis on which the association is to be formed will be settled at the delegate meeting to take place as above, but whether it be that of a residential manhood suffrage, or household and lodger franchise, or a less extended suffrage, one of the principles of the association is to be that it will accept any installment of Reform that may be offered, from whatever party it may proceed. Should the proposed association be successfully established, it cannot fail in exercising considerable influence over the future of Reform, and in all probability become a power that no Government, to what party so ever it may belong, will be able to despise with impunity.¹

¹ Vide especially the Reform meeting at Leeds, an account of which is to be found in the Times, February 2, 1865.

After being formed, the association did not exercise much influence during the year 1865, and the Reformers were unable to get either party to pledge itself at the election, although a meeting of delegates, held at Manchester in May, passed resolutions expressing "dissatisfaction with the present state of the people as a gross injustice to the working classes, regret that the Government has abandoned the Reform question, and an opinion that Reformers throughout the country should support at the next general election only such candidates as are favorable to the introduction of a comprehensive measure of Reform in the next session of Parliament."¹

¹Quoted from Observer.

Palmerston apparently was influenced no more by the Reform League than he had been by the friends of the Baines' bill of 1865. This bill, proposing the reduction of the borough franchise, if of any effect, hurt the cause of Reform. The author of it himself admitted the apathy out of doors; he urged, however, that the question be discussed and settled in time of calm "lest some day it should take the shape of a demand for universal suffrage."² Other speakers corroborated his statements with respect to the attitude of the nation, and the majority of the House agreed with Mr. Horsman when this gentleman, although avowing a sincere desire that the working classes should have some voice, urged that the votes of mere numbers never ought to and never should govern the country.

The first election for the new Parliament took place on the eleventh of July and on the twenty-fifth the Times was able to announce that the "restful and thankful" nation had given Palmerston 367 Liberal as against 290 Conservative members. The Annual Register thought this election noteworthy for its lack of excitement; the *Times*³ thought it memorable for the evidences of national prosperity and the contentment which its history would afford. In fact there had been no definite issue. As for Reform—"willingly or unwillingly" said the Quarterly Review,¹ "they (the Palmerston Administration) have brought the . . . movement to a deadlock, and have made it almost impossible for anyone who comes after them for a considerable number of years to call it into activity again." Mr. John Bright declared that Reform should be postponed till the close of the official life of Lord Palmerston, "the only man in the Liberal party able and willing to betray it:"² a part of this statement Mr. Bright within a year found to be untrue. It must be added that many members in election speeches had given individual pledges to take up the question.

¹ The Times, May 16, 1865.

² Hansard, vol. clxxviii, pp. 1371 et seq.

³ The Times, July 4, 1865, editorial.

Lord Palmerston died on October 18, 1865, and with the formation of the Russell-Gladstone ministry there seemed to be hope for the Reformers. It was thought in some quarters³ that Russell would have to do something lest he forfeit a long-standing pledge, and Gladstone was felt to be in favor of Reform. In 1864 the latter had uttered the fated words of which mention has been made in a preceding chapter: "I venture to say that every man who is not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness or of political danger, is morally entitled to come within the pale of the constitution." Vague as were these words, and qualified as they had been by a protest against sudden or violent or excessive or intoxicating change, nevertheless they caused distrust among the Conservatives and the Whigs.⁴ Now that the retarding influence of Palmerston

¹ Quarterly Review, July, 1865.

² Cf. the Times, September 20, 1865, editorial.

³ Cf. Frazer's, June, 1866, pp. 683 and 684.

⁴ Vide John Morley, The Life of William Ewart Gladstone, vol. ii, pp. 126-131.

was gone, what might Gladstone not do? And his defeat in 1865 at Oxford and his election from Lancashire would tend all the more to unmuzzle him. Hence the Reformers claimed him as their own and quoted his words again and again. They were encouraged, too, by the addition to the Government of Mr. Forster and Mr. Goschen, two men of the Radical wing.¹

Reform meetings held in the latter part of November and during December, compared with those held one year later, appear to have been very unimportant, although enough interest was shown to warrant the statement of the Times on the eighteenth of December, that the question of Reform seemed to have revived,²—a statement later contradicted. A meeting held in London on the twelfth of December, is important as showing what reforms the working men expected to result from a wide extension of the franchise.³ Here as at many of the meetings of the following two months manhood suffrage was demanded, but few really had hopes that such a request would be listened to. As Mr. Tom Hughes said at a Reform meeting at Lambeth: "They might just as well ask for the whole loaf, and they would be more likely to get half of it than if they went for only two-thirds."⁴ Some of the speakers, however, did not want the full loaf or even the two-thirds. Members of the House of Commons of the Liberal or Radical denomination who were trying to guide or to make public opinion, gave various solutions to the Reform problem in their "out of door" speeches. The meetings went on, without impressing the

¹ The Times, November 25, 1865, editorial. Vide the London Review, October 12, 1867, for a life of Goschen.

² The Times, December 18, 1865, editorial.

³ Cf. infra, pp. 130-133, for a complete discussion of this topic.

⁴ The Times, January 13, 1866.

Government very much, however, for in the Queen's speech Reform was the last of more than twenty subjects and the two sentences about it were very vague: the question had been "ushered in with the modesty proper to an experience of many failures,"¹ and if we are to believe the Times, a franchise bill,² which was brought in on March 12, 1866, conservative as it could well be, produced no applause: "We have listened in vain for the faintest note of approval, or the contrary or bare recognition from the provinces. . . . Not even the workingmen make the least sign, or seem to be aware that they are to be presented with a very considerable slice of the British Constitution."³ The *Saturday Review*⁴ expressed a like opinion; "The organs of the Government may put as good a face on the matter as they like, but the fact is that the Reform Bill has fallen dead. The country does not care for it an atom. There is no loud outcry against it, but there is scarcely a whisper of approval of it." The Radicals claimed there was a popular desire for the bill. Their arguments may be seen from Mr. Bright's Manchester speech of March 27, 1866:

These gentlemen who oppose this Bill tell us in the House of Commons and some of their newspapers tell us outside, that really nobody wants this Bill, and that a few men who have objects of their own to serve are constantly talking about it, but that the great body of the people have really no interest in it whatever. They said exactly the same of the Bill of 1831. I stated in the House of Commons the other night that in the years from 1821 to 1831 there were scarcely any petitions presented to Parliament in favor of Parliamentary Reform, and yet in the year 1831 the whole thing was an explosion. The House of Commons was terror-stricken, and men of great

¹ The Times, February 8, 1866, editorial.

² For detailed information on the bill, cf. infra, pp. 142-3.

³ Ibid., March 20, 1866, editorial.

⁴ The Saturday Review, March 24, 1866.

families were almost hiding themselves from popular indignation. What do these gentlemen want now? Are they content to be taught by great and peaceful meetings, and by the presentation of great petitions, or do they want something more? ¹

Bright then urged the holding of monster meetings and elsewhere ² declared that "if Parliament Street from Charing Cross to the venerable Abbey were filled with men seeking a Reform Bill, . . . these slanderers of their countrymen would learn to be civil if they did not learn to love freedom."

As a matter of fact, the Council of the Reform League determined to support the Government measure, and the various Reform meetings held during the Easter recess, many of them under the auspices of the Liberals, it is true, also passed resolutions favoring the measure but expressing a desire for greater reductions in qualifications. It seemed for a long time during the first weeks of April that the agitation was to become general. Meetings were held ³ in Edinburgh (April 2), in Sheffield (April 2), in West Riding of Yorkshire (April 3), in Burnley (April 3), in Rochdale (April 4), in Lambeth (April 4), in Hanley (April 4), Exeter (April 4), Manchester (April 5), Liverpool (April 5), and so on. Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Gladstone made important speeches. The last named in the famous speeches at Liverpool (April fifth and sixth) declared that the Government was staking its political character on the adoption of the bill in its main provisions, that the trumpet had been blown with no uncertain sound, that the Rubicon had been passed, the bridges broken and the boats burned behind them.

¹ The Times, March 28, 1866.

² In a letter to a Reform meeting at Birmingham; vide Annals of Our Time, March 26, 1866.

³ Following announcements in issues of the Times.

The result, gentlemen [said he] is in other hands than ours. . . . I can't doubt from the extraordinary working and movement of society that there is on the part of the masses of the community a forward and onward movement, which forward and onward movement will be perfectly safe and harmless, and not only safe and harmless, but infinitely profitable if we only deal with it wisely and in time. But read the signs of the times. The voice that once spoke as never man spoke rebuked those in authority who could not read the signs of the times. Does any man really suppose that the political limit signified by the number ten is to be forever and ever, from generation to generation, the limit within which all are to enjoy, but beyond which every man is to be deprived the enjoyment of the franchise? Certainly not. The defeat of the Bill, what would it procure?—an interval, but not an interval of repose; an interval of fever, an interval of expectation, an interval for the working of those influences which might possibly arise even to the formidable dimensions of political danger. Let the great English nation be wise, and be wise in time.¹

The audience cheered him to the echo not only upon the expression of this sentiment but also upon his attack² on a conservative section of the Liberals called the Adullamites³ who refused to follow him in the question of Reform and especially upon an invective against the Adullamite leader, Robert Lowe.

But the enthusiasm which the Chancellor of the Exchequer attempted to kindle by his visit to Liverpool seemed, like a fire of tow, hastily lit and soon extinguished. Such was the opinion of the Times. From the middle of April until the middle of June there were scarcely any Reform meetings. A graph roughly representing the agitation for Reform as shown by the number and enthusiasm of the meetings held from the summer of 1865 to the summer of 1866, would give a curve rising gradually during the late autumn of 1865, keeping to a level during January and February, 1866, falling slightly the first of March, rising again toward the middle of the month and really gaining respectable height during the first weeks of April, after which it would fall rapidly and remain low in the scale until the first of July.

¹ The Times, April 7, 1866.

² On the previous day.

³ More detailed information on the Adullamites and their leader is given in the next chapter.

In fact the demand from without had not been great enough to produce the desired effect upon the House of Commons,¹ although it looked for a time as if the meetings of the Easter recess might be the beginning of a real agitation. The failure to impress the Conservatives and Adullamites was due to several things: the agitation had not been carried on for any considerable time; enthusiasm at the meetings took the form of praises for greater reductions of qualifications rather than for anything which the bill contained; the Conservative press² felt that Liberal leaders were getting up the agitation and that noted speakers such as Bright and Gladstone took people to the meetings rather than any desire on the part of the working class to force Reform; the all but universal opposition of the London press³ and the censorious tone of London society counterbalanced favorable comments upon the bill. Moreover, a large number of the recently elected members of the House were quite unwilling to pass a measure which would have the effect of causing them to appear before their constituents and of exposing them to the risk and cost of

¹ Cf. Fortnightly Review, vol. vii, p. 745 (Molesworth's article); Blackwood's, February, 1866, pp. 147-148; Fortnightly Review, vol. v, June 15 and July 15, 1866.

² Cf. Blackwood's, February, 1866, and letter to the Times, February 3, 1866.

³ Cf. Edinburgh Review, April, 1866.

a contested election. Another cause, economic at least in part, would tend to make many members oppose change: the working class, it was felt,¹ wanted the franchise for a reason other than that of merely casting a vote, and their interests might not always coincide with the interests of capitalists and landowners. The workingman could see the need of great improvement in governing the country; for in spite of the prosperity of the early 'sixties already described, scenes of misery were not few or hard to be found. As the Fortnightly Review pointed out,² one had only to wander from the lace makers of Devonshire to the strawplaiters of Hertfordshire, the glovers of Worcester-shire, and the hosiers of Nottinghamshire to find the usual close rooms, long hours, inadequate payment, bad food, disregard of physical wants, undue pressure, and everything calculated to make life miserable. In the town, in the country, on the surface and beneath it, one would see a dreadful catalogue of human sufferings; poor wretched creatures laboring among the mineral deposits in danger of death alike from poisonous vapors and from lack of proper safeguards; children working in glass foundries day and night without intermission, or mixing in gangs in the fields under the eye of a ruffian taskmaster. The member of Parliament might console himself over the situation with the philosophy of an Emerson or the theories of a Ricardo or Malthus; the workingman as a lawmaker would mend matters. For instance, Mr. Odger, shoemaker, speaking at the National Reform League meeting at St. Martin's Hall a fortnight before Christmas, 1865, declared that if the working classes were given the vote they would do away with the present class legislation and would see "that the poor man's daughter, who was worked 12, 14, and 16 hours a day, should have time to go abroad and view the face of nature. They would prevent the poor man's child from going in early life into mines and workshops before it was educated. They would prevent the poor agricultural laborer from working for 8s. per week."¹ Professor Beesly² at a Reform meeting held in St. Martin's Hall, April 11, 1866, instanced as grievances the unequal pressure of indirect taxation on the workingmen, who paid 4s. a week out of 20s. wages, the operation of the game laws, the punishment of servants for breach of contract, the excessive expenditure on the army and navy as compared with the education grant, the treatment of the poor in workhouses, and the monopoly of land by large proprietors. These were grievances which a reformed Parliament might be expected to redress, but which were not likely to be redressed under the present system.

¹ Vide, infra, the arguments presented by the Conservatives and Adul-lamites against the bill.

² Fortnightly Review, vol. iv, article by Edward Wilson.

The middle class and the skilled workingmen, however, were prosperous and the lot of the unskilled workingmen was improving,³ notwithstanding these complaints which could have been made during any period from 1815, so that the need for social reform was not pressing enough to keep an agitation going. "If there were distress in the country" said the Fortnightly Review,⁴ "we cannot say what might be the effect of representations made to the working classes that the extension of the franchise would improve their condition, but as wages are rising, and no political grievances are felt, the working classes have certainly not hitherto responded to any efforts to rouse them."

¹ From the Quarterly Review, January, 1866, pp. 264 et seq.; also to be found in the Times.

² The Times, April 12, 1866.

³ Blackwood's, February, 1866, p. 144.

⁴ Fortnightly Review, vol. iv, "Public Affairs," p. 756.

The North British Review of March, 1866, pointed out that people thought Reform was bound to come but that if anything should occur to disturb that confidence, those who maintained the indifference of the people would find themselves unpleasantly startled from their fond belief.¹ And it so happened that the arguments of the conservative Liberals who go by the name of Adullamites against any extension of the suffrage and the defeat of the bill with the consequent resignation of the Liberal leaders did help to shatter the indifference at about the same time that the economic condition of the country was rapidly growing worse.

With the fall of the ministry the agitation was renewed. The Adullamites, ably led by Lowe, had caused the defeat of the bill; their arguments against the present bill were equally applicable to any change in franchise qualifications whatsoever, and Lowe's speeches so successful in their immediate purpose were used by the Reformers with great advantage in arousing the working classes to demand their rights. Mr. Frederic Harrison,² writing for the Fortnightly Review,³ expressed the opinion that full justice had not been done to the speeches of Mr. Lowe. "In our memory," he wrote, "it has not been known that the arguments of one independent speaker have accomplished so much; checked the current of constitutional development, roused the upper classes to resistance, terrified the middle classes into hesitation, and stung the working classes into action."

Frazer's declared the spirit of the unenfranchised classes had been kindled by Mr. Lowe's "contumelious speeches, so delightful to the Tory part of his audience."⁴ The ¹The North British Review, March, 1866, p. 232.

²Frederic Harrison wrote much in favor of trade unions.

³*Fortnightly Review*, vol. vii, p. 261.

⁴*Frazer's*, November, 1866, "Why we want a Reform Bill," p. 559.

speakers at the meetings of June and July and later were bitter against the Adullamites. At a conference of the National Reform Union,¹ an association largely of the middle classes but originating at the suggestion of the workmen of Leeds for a platform upon which the two classes could co-operate, a Mr. Partridge gave a typical speech² in which he declared that the obstacles to their representation were not the Tories, who were their "natural enemies," nor the Liberals, who were their friends, but "this mongrel party, which was neither for nor against them, but which was for itself always and only."³ It was remarked that the bill of 1832 had been passed under circumstances by no means peaceful, that the French Revolution ought to serve as a warning to the reactionaries. Lowe, in fact, and others of his group received disapproving letters⁴ from their constituents, since, without a dissolution, no other means of expression was possible.

The renewed agitation was manifest by the important meetings of early July—one of July 2, 1866, in Trafalgar Square, and one of July 5, 1866, at Birmingham. Seven or eight thousand persons were present at Birmingham where resolutions were passed against the Tories and Adullamites and in favor of a dissolution. There was an expression of want of confidence in any ministry Derby might form. At the demonstration at Trafalgar Square there was present a large number of well-behaved people; Mr. Beales, head of the Reform League, spoke of the "thunder of the crowd's gratitude to such real patriots as Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright." Mr. Lucraft, a Hoxton journeyman and

¹ Held June 22, 1866, at Manchester.

² To be found in the Times, June 25, 1866.

³ It was sometimes stated that Lowe was anxious for the downfall of the Liberals because he had been given no position in the cabinet.

⁴ These can be found in the Times.

reformer, gave the rallying cry of "Reform, and Gladstone and Liberty." Later in the evening "Lucraft and his mob,"—8,000 of them—marched with due enthusiasm to Gladstone's house, but found only the ladies at home. Such meetings, however, seem unimportant when compared with the Hyde Park incident.

The Hyde Park affair, described with considerable detail in almost every English history of the nineteenth century, was a somewhat spectacular incident about which a great number of particulars have been given, some true, a number not to be verified, most of them unimportant compared with the effect of the "riot."¹ When the Reform League announced that a great demonstration in favor of the extension of the suffrage was to be held in Hyde Park, Mr. Walpole, the Home Secretary of the Conservative Government, which had recently come into power, had the Commissioner² of Police of the Metropolis insert in the newspapers a notice to the effect that no such meeting would be allowed. It was stated that the meeting was illegal, would lead to disorderly conduct and would endanger public peace. Mr. Beales in reply said that the meeting would be held unless he were shown the law by which the Commissioner had authority to prohibit it. The Reformers regretted exceedingly, they said, that the Home Secretary was determined to put himself "in a position of wanton antagonism" to the people, but were willing to put the blame of any possible collision between themselves and the police—a collision which they promised would take place if the meeting were forcibly interfered with—upon the Home Secretary.

Accordingly on the twenty-second of July, the Reformers marched³ in goodly numbers to Hyde Park, found the gates closed and sixteen or eighteen hundred police waiting for them. Mr. Beales formally demanded admittance. This was refused, of course, and having raised the legal question desired, he with the other leaders proceeded to Trafalgar Square, there to hold the program as prearranged. The greater part of the crowd, however, did not follow the leaders but finding the railings around the park none too strong began to push them over,¹ and rushed upon the forbidden ground. Thereupon began a scuffle with the police, resulting in a few injuries on both sides. Some "roughs" were a little troublesome; all in all about eighty or ninety persons were taken into custody. Those who were bold enough to make speeches after their entrance into the park were not interrupted by the police. As a matter of fact little damage was done except to the shrubbery and the flower beds.

¹ Walpole's History of Twenty-five Years gives a very good account.

² Sir Richard Mayne.

³ Vide Annual Register, chronicle, July, 1866.

But the influence of the Hyde Park affair was very great. The Times protested that such a gathering was a display of numbers to overawe the Legislature and the ruling classes, that it was useless for political discussion but might easily produce serious danger to the public peace, that finally, excepting some decent people, it was a mass of the coarsest mob.¹ The Reformers, on the other hand, claimed that the ministry, by employing the police to prevent forcibly the working classes from a peaceable meeting in Hyde Park at which they wished to complain of their exclusion from the suffrage, had shown that it possessed all the old spirit of Toryism and distrust of the people and hence had forfeited all claims to the confidence and support of the country.² In fact the president of the Reform League seems to have outgeneraled his opponents completely. After the Home Secretary had forbidden the use of the park without any specific right to do so, the attempt of Beales to hold the meeting in spite of opposition was bound to advertise the Reform cause. Had the Reformers been kept out of the park, a cry against class government would immediately have been taken up by every association in the country; had the crowd been allowed in after various notices had forbidden the meeting, the Government's surrender would have been demonstrative of the force of the people's will and hence would have been suggestive of further fulfillments of their demands. As it was, the best possible happened for Mr. Beales. The people after being refused admittance, had managed to get their demands in a semi-forcible manner but with responsibility unfixed. The Reformers could point to victory; the upper classes had the power only to decry the act as violence. What, in fact, could be done by the Government in such a situation? The police had been unable to control the people; the Chief Commissioner of Police, on the evening which succeeded the disturbance, had even asked that troops be held in readiness for him.¹ The Reform League attempted to help matters by agreeing to get the mob from the Park upon the understanding that the legal right of meeting therein should be tested. But the issuance of its placard, without authority, that there should be no further attempt to hold "a meeting in Hyde Park except only by arrangement with the Government, on Monday afternoon, July 30," connoted that the Home Secretary had consented, as the price of the League's assistance, to concede the whole principle by allowing a meeting. Mr. Walpole because of this unfortunate incident was almost driven from office!² Reform had been brought before the country in a startling manner. Mr. Beales is authority³ for the statement that there was a general feeling prevalent throughout the country that the events of the last month had done more to hasten the progress of Reform than all the exertions of the last thirty years.

¹ Justin McCarthy in his History of Our Own Times, 2 vols. (New York, 1880), vol. ii, p. 344, gives the following account: "Emerson has said that every revolution, however great, is first of all a thought in the mind of a single man. One disappointed Reformer lingering in Park Lane, with his breast against the rails, as the poetic heroine had hers, metaphorically, against the thorn, became impressed with the idea that the barrier was somewhat frail and shaky. How would it be, he vaguely thought for a moment, if he were to give an impulse and drive the railing in? What, he wondered to himself, would come of that? The temptation was great. He shook the rails; the rails begun to give way. Not that alone, but the sudden movement was felt along the line, and into a hundred minds came at once the grand revolutionary idea which an instant before had been the thought in the mind of one hitherto unimportant man. A simultaneous impulsive rush, and some yards of railing were down, and men in scores were tumbling, and floundering, and rushing over them." Unfortunately, McCarthy has not seen fit to give to the world the name of his hero of original thought.

¹The Times, July 24, 1866, editorial.

²The Times, July 31, Reform League demonstration in Agricultural Hall (July 30, 1866); the Times, July 25, London Working Men's Association; the Times, July 28, editorial from Pall Mall Gazette, etc.

There can be no doubt as to the influence of the League after the Hyde Park affair. In the first place it was able to keep going a series of monster meetings, and in the second place it entered into an alliance with the trade unions.⁴

¹ Walpole, History of Twenty-five Years, vol. ii, p. 175.

² Ibid., pp. 175 and 176. Mr. Walpole was the private secretary to his father, the Home Secretary, in 1866, and was in closest communication with him. Further data on the mistake of the leaders of the Reform League in issuing the placard may be found in George Jacob Holyoake, Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life, 2 vols. (London, 1900, 4th edition), vol. ii, chap. xcii.

³ Cf. the Times, August 16, 1866.

⁴ Sidney and Beatrice Webb in the History of Trade Unionism (London, 1911, new edition), pp. 223, 224, and 231, emphasize the influence of the "Junta," an informal cabinet of five trade-union leaders who lived in London and were in constant communication with one another, toward having the trade unions agitate for political Reform, even in spite of "a strong traditional repugnance to political action." Under the influence of the "Junta," the London Trades council "enthusiastically threw itself into the demonstration" in favor of Reform in

The great demonstrations of the autumn of 1866 were tried out first "in the provinces." On the twenty-seventh of August there was a demonstration at Birmingham where, according to the reports, "thousands and thousands" were present.¹ In honor of the occasion all the nearby towns turned out and business in the city was stopped. Members of trade and co-operative societies collected at nine o'clock in the morning and proceeded in six divisions to the meeting grounds. Here resolutions were passed in favor of manhood suffrage and the ballot, and expressing gratitude to Gladstone, Bright, Mill, and Beales. The great event at the evening meeting was a speech by John Bright; "let us do as your forefathers did thirty-four years ago, — let us have associations everywhere; let every workshop and every factory be a Reform Association," was his plea.

During September there took place a great number of fairly well attended meetings. The Times contains data, for instance, as follows: September 1, Reform meeting at Bristol, —10,000 present;² September 1, Reform demonstration at Bolton, —3,000 present;³ September 5, Reform meeting at Leeds;⁴ September 10, Reform meeting at Bermondsey, —7,000 present;⁵ Reform demonstration at Hanley on September 12 with 15,000 to 20,000 present;⁶ and finally on September 24, a big Reform demonstration at Manchester.⁷ The 1866. The London trade unions with the exception of two small clubs, did not, however, join the Reform League in a corporate capacity, although many of the local Birmingham trade unions became directly affiliated with that organization.

¹ Vide the Times, August 28, 1866.

² Cf. the Times, September 3, 1866.

³ Ibid., September 4, 1866.

⁴ Ibid., September 7, 1866.

⁵ Ibid., September 11, 1866.

⁶ Ibid., September 12, 1866.

⁷ Ibid., September 25, 1866.

following short summary concerning this latter meeting is given in the Annual Register:

This afternoon [September 24] a meeting, supposed to be larger than any hitherto assembled in England, was held at Manchester. During the morning many local divisions marched into the town from the various populous districts around, carrying flags inscribed with the words "National Reform Union," and proceeded to the square called Camp-field, a center surrounded by ten acres, in which six platforms were erected. Notwithstanding the torrents of rain which continued throughout the day, the numbers assembled were estimated by the reporters, both of the local and of the London press, at between 100,000 and 200,000 persons. At each of the above sections these resolutions were carried, namely, 1. "That this meeting protests against the perpetuation of class government to the exclusion of the great majority of the people from the franchise; refuses to allow itself to be made an instrument to further the means of contending parties or the selfish interests of any class; and pledges itself to adopt all means of organizing and agitating for the only just basis of representation—registered residential manhood suffrage and the ballot." 2. "That this meeting rejoices in the formation of the northern department of the Reform League, and pledges its support to the executive council in the organization of branches throughout the north of England, and hereby declares its confidence in Mr. Edmund Beales and the executive of the Reform League in London." 3. "That this meeting tenders its warmest and most grateful thanks to the Right Honorable William Ewart Gladstone, John Bright, Esq., John Stuart Mill, Esq., and all friends of Reform who, throughout the late discussions in Parliament, vindicated the character and protected the rights of the people; and further expresses confidence in the honesty and ability of Mr. John Bright to champion the people's cause in Parliament during the coming parliamentary struggle."¹

¹ Annual Register, 1866, chronicle, pp. 137 et seq.

At the evening meeting John Bright was the principal speaker; so great was the crowd that only one-fourth of those who applied, could enter Free Trade Hall.

On the eighth of October occurred another great Reform meeting of the working classes—this time at Leeds. The weather was favorable and there were present nearly 200,000 persons. As early as four o'clock in the morning—says the *Annual Register*¹—came some arrivals into Leeds from distant localities, and during the greater part of the forenoon every highway and byway leading into this city was overrun by large or small parties of operatives, the majority well clad and in holiday trim—all of them hastening with exuberant cheerfulness to some rendezvous which had been fixed upon as their rallying point. Along the Bradford road, as well as the roads of Dewsbury and Halifax, and by the country lanes leading from the many clothing villages of the districts, came trooping along on foot at short intervals large bodies of men with music and banners; for at many of the mills and workshops of Bradford and the adjacent towns as well as of Leeds, there was a complete holiday. The procession contained some 70,000 persons—an orderly line of men walking five abreast four miles long, with its marshals and musicians, with its flag-bearers carrying banners, mottoes and ensigns. Arriving at Woodhouse Moor the crowd was addressed by the speakers who offered the following resolutions: protest against and denial of the charges of venality, ignorance, drunkenness, and indifference to Reform brought against the working classes during the last session of Parliament; pledges of co-operation in the cause of registered residential manhood suffrage and the ballot; acknowledgment of the services of Gladstone, Bright and Mill. At the evening meeting Mr. Forster and Mr. Bright spoke, the latter declaring to the assembly: "The workingmen must combine, and they must subscribe a penny a week or a penny a month from the thousands and from the millions to raise funds that will enable you to carry on the most gigantic and successful agitation that this country has ever seen. It is mainly your own voice that will decide your own fate."¹

¹ Annual Register, 1866, chronicle, pp. 141 et seq.; vide the Times, October 9, 1866.

On the sixteenth of October there was a Reform demonstration at Glasgow—such a demonstration as has not been seen since the year 1832, said the Fortnightly Review.² So large was the parade that it took two hours to get past any given spot.³ At the meeting there were the usual resolutions. In the evening Mr. Bright again was the chief speaker. Before he delivered his speech an address was made to him which is highly significant as showing the economic and social conditions which a reformed Parliament might well improve. The speaker declared:

We dread that gulf, pauperism, the scandal of the world, amid unparalleled wealth, which is swallowing up our aged and infirm, and in which so many of our youth are abandoned to misery and crime. We protest against the domination of sectional parties, who, professing to govern for the people, have failed to provide education for the nation, which popular Governments in other lands have secured, leaving us far behind. We point to the wasteful expenditure which has produced and fostered our dangerous national debt, sapping the energies of the country, and burdening it in the race of nations. In the city from which Smith taught we point to the unsatisfactory laws of banking, and the attendant paralyzing of our trade. We denounce the system of misgovernment in certain colonies. . . . We protest against the present sectional representation, its restricted basis, its gross inequalities, the interference with tenant voters, the shameful bribery and corruption. . . . We seek . . . to assist in solution of these great problems on which the future of our country depends . . . but warn our rulers against the continued breach of the Great Charter wrung from reluctant hands at Runnymede, which provides that the rulers "shall not deny nor delay justice to anyone."¹

¹The Times, October 9, 1866.

²*Fortnightly Review*, vol. vi (November 15, 1866), p. 748.

³The Times, October 17, 1866.

Mr. Bright, in replying, denounced the landed interests; he acknowledged that the class which had hitherto ruled in the country had failed miserably, that it reveled in power and wealth, while at its foot, a terrible peril for its future, lay a multitude which it had neglected. "If a class has failed," he shouted, "let us try the nation. That is our faith, that is our cry. Let us try the nation."

With the exception of a demonstration at Edinburgh² on the seventeenth of November there was no great activity among the Reformers until the third of December, when the London workingmen were given a chance to show their interest in the question of the day. For weeks this trades' Reform demonstration had been the talk of all London.³ Rumor had it that 200,000 would take a part in the procession, and many and various were the suggestions sent to the newspapers by interested parties as to the marching and handling of such a crowd. As a matter of fact there were some 23,000 in the parade, according to the Inspector of Police. The members represented about fifty societies, and each trade or society had one or more banners.⁴ Some of these contained mottoes of rather general application,⁵ as

¹ Ibid.

² Cf. the Times, November 19, 1866.

³ The Times, November 30, 1866.

⁴ Annual Register, 1866, chronicle, p. 189.

⁵ Cf. the Times, December 4, 1866.

"Taxation without representation is tyranny"; others were rather piquant. The tallow chandlers had a motto "Bright and Light"; the cabinetmakers, the inscriptions: "No more oligarchical rule—the people are determined to be the cabinetmakers", "Bright cabinetmakers wanted—no Adul-lamites need apply"; the shoemakers, an elegant boot on a pole, with words, "It's the wearer that feels where the shoe pinches." The Workingmen's Association was represented by a banner with the inscription, "to procure the political enfranchisement and promote the social and general interests of the industrial classes." The Reformers, of course, had their song, the sentiment of which may be seen from the concluding verse:

"Then shout with all your might
God save Gladstone, Beales, and Bright;
Wave your banners, let your ranks closer form,
And let your watchword be—
Old England, Liberty,
Manhood Suffrage, Vote by Ballot and Reform."

The demeanor of those in procession was irreproachable; even the Times declared that the day's proceedings showed what the sturdiest Conservative would have to admit, that the more intelligent mechanics were at least the equals, in all that constitutes good citizens, of the small shopkeepers who did possess the franchise.¹

The crowd of spectators, many thousand strong in spite of mud, slush, and a cold, drizzly, uncomfortable rain, behaved in seemly fashion, and listened good-naturedly to readings by some of their members. The following speech especially produced much merriment:

And now, dearly beloved, the Gospel of the day is the Hyde Park railings and the cause of their destruction. Now it was shortly after the premature death of the Russell Administration that the Tories took office, and that a couple of chiefs of the tribes of the Derbyites and Disraelites laid their heads together to consider in what way they might . . . bamboozle the working man. And behold there sprang on the face of the earth a new race of people called Adullamites, who were like unto their namesakes of old, a dissatisfied and a two-faced people, and like the chameleon, could change their color at will. And their chief was a Low(e) man, from the land of moonrakers, and he and his colleagues were the Reformers of to-day and the Tories of to-morrow. And they said to the people, "Behold, we are on your side," and at the same time they were seeking how they might destroy their cause.

¹ The Times, December 4, 1866.

Then followed a description of Hyde Park, of the "passing away" of the rails, of the struggle with the police; and finally came the supplication: "From having the Park gates shut against us, save us, good Walpole." Upon the arrival of the procession at the Beaufort grounds, the speakers of the day began to give addresses. Mr. Beales declared that the national movement which commenced in July last in Trafalgar Square, and at Hyde Park, had been increasing in volume, in intensity, and in enthusiastic unanimity throughout the length and breadth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. He wanted manhood suffrage. A Mr. Greening of Manchester pointed out that the working class could not expect a righteous verdict from a packed jury of rich men whose whole interest lay in one direction and who therefore could not do justice to the nation, even if they would. A Colonel Dickson stated that in France every workingman was enfranchised, that in Italy the case was much the same, and that even the tyrannical Bismarck was giving universal suffrage to the Prussians.¹ He said that in the House of Commons as at present constituted, there were not above a dozen men who cared a straw for Reform; the members of the House were the nominees of the House of Lords; many of them were railway directors, lawyers, and bankers, but scarcely any of them represented the working classes. Mr. Leicester, a glassblower, spoke with considerable vehemence: "The question was, would they suffer those little-minded, decrepit, humped-backed, one-eyed scoundrels who sat in the House of Commons to rob and defraud them any longer of their rights. . . . Whether those who had squandered the people's earnings like water should continue to do so?" The usual resolutions in favor of registered residential manhood suffrage and the ballot and thanks to Gladstone, Bright, and Mill were voted.

¹*Cf.* chapter i.

The following evening a great in-door meeting in connection with the trades' demonstration was held in St. James' Hall. Admission was obtained by tickets which sold for five shillings, three shillings and one shilling; and the hall was crowded. Mr. G. Potter,¹ chairman, declared that he would say once and for all that if the Tory party was not satisfied with what had already been done, then they would commence the next year with something which would be admitted to be sufficient.² Mr. Bright, however, was the leading speaker. He asked if anyone wished the workingmen of Great Britain to be driven in defense of their rights to the course of the Fenians—secret societies, oaths and drillings, arms and menace, and a threat of violence and insurrection, and declared that the Parliament of landowners and rich men either were wholly ignorant of or they wholly despised that great national opinion which had been exhibited during the last three or four months; that they were resisting "until the discontent which is now so general shall become universal, and that which is now only a great exhibition of opinion may become necessarily and inevitably a great and menacing exhibition of force."

¹ Mr. Potter, editor of the Beehive, was influential in trade union affairs.

² The Times, December 5, 1866.

Significant as was the display of interest by the workingmen despite many obstacles — the state of the weather, the time of the year, the necessity of the loss of a day's work to all those attending, the threatened discharge of employees by several large firms employing thousands of workmen if they attended the demonstration (a threat which was reported to the committees as having been carried out in many instances) ¹ — even more significant was the fact that this was the first time the trades' societies of London had taken part in a political movement. Mr. Bright tells us ² that he had warned workingmen eight years before that the time had come or would soon come when it would be their duty to make use of the organization of trade and friendly societies "to bear upon the Government the united power of a just demand"; that "one year only of the united action of the working classes, through their existing organization, would wholly change the aspect of the Reform question." Already the trade societies had taken part in some of the demonstrations outside the metropolis and were now according to plans made some months previous, ³ active in London. The Times stood against the unions as a political power, claiming that it would excite still more the jealousy of the middle classes "by the prospect of a vast organization for political control against which they themselves would have no power unless they resorted in turn to combinations unknown in our Constitutional history"; that the chief cause of the postponement of Reform from year to year had been the tacit fear felt by the middle class of this very organization of the artisans.⁴ It attacked Bright in no undecisive manner:

¹ Vide letter of Robert Hartwell, secretary of demonstration committee, in the Times, December 12, 1866.

² In his speech at the trades' Reform meeting, December 4, 1866.

³ Cf. the Times, April 27, 1866, editorial.

⁴ The Times, December 5, 1866, editorial.

Mr. Bright has taken a step which is rather the last cast of a gambler than the well-considered move of one who would be a statesman. He has invited the Trades' Unions and Friendly Societies to renounce one of their first principles—to throw off what some thought a disguise, and openly assume a political character, with a special view to counterbalancing the influence of land, wealth, and rank. At present the constitution of most of these Societies expressly prohibits political action, not only because politics are not their business, but because it is advisable to welcome all, whatever their opinions.¹

And the Times was not alone in thinking that the mind of a nefarious superbeing had assisted in forming such an organization as the trade unions. It must be remembered that this was a period of strikes and lockouts. In October one² of a series of crimes for which Sheffield was notorious, had been committed in New Hereford Street of that city. Such events were so well advertised by press rumors that the isolated cases of violence and intimidation which were limited to certain trades in certain localities, seemed to be to the public, a systematic attempt on the part of trade unions generally to obtain their ends by violence, and "the commercial objection to industrial disputes became confused with the feeling of abhorrence created by the idea of vast combinations of men sticking at neither violence nor murder to achieve their ends. The 'terrorism of Trade unions' became a nightmare."³

Such an organization not only was strongly in favor of Reform but was willing to be active in the cause. On December nineteenth a meeting of the trades' council passed this resolution:

¹ The Times, December 6, 1866, editorial.

² An explosion of gunpowder in the house of a man who was working for a firm against which the saw grinders had struck.

³ Sidney and Beatrice Webb, The History of Trade Unionism, p. 240.

That in the opinion of this delegate meeting of the trades of London, the House of Commons has, by its treachery to the cause of Reform, as shown by its defeat of the late Government Bill, and more especially by the cheers and acclamations which followed the vicious slanders of Messrs. Lowe, Horsman, Elcho, and others equally unscrupulous, lost the confidence of the people, and forced upon the trades' unionists of Great Britain and Ireland the absolute necessity of assisting either in their co-operate or individual capacity, as each society may for itself determine, the present agitation for the enfranchisement of the working classes of this kingdom, now unjustly excluded by class laws, made by class-elected Parliament; and we hereby declare our sympathy with, and adhesion to, the principles of the Reform League as the only true basis of representation, and advise trades' unionists, both in London and in the provinces, to aid the forthcoming demonstration under the auspices of the League, to be held in London on Monday after the opening of the next session of Parliament. And we further declare that while advising the great bodies of trades' unionists thus to act, we have no desire to make our societies channels for political agitation, but to aid in settling a great question that has so long disturbed the social as well as the political relations of this country, to the detriment of its progress and the injury of its people.¹

The descriptions of the demonstrations during the autumn and early winter of 1866 bring out three or four facts: with the exception of the incident at Hyde Park, the crowd had been orderly and good-natured. It had been a large crowd, too,—provided that processions of thirty thousand and audiences of one hundred and fifty thousand as reported be considered a large crowd.² The speech-makers had in many cases pointed out justly defects in the government of the country and had suggested certain remedies; a number of the speakers, however, had not been altogether temperate and had urged force to obtain demands. Finally the trade unions, organizations which the middle and upper classes feared, had joined in definite alliance with the Reform League and the Radicals like Bright. Thus stood matters at the opening of the new year. Parliament would meet in February with the Conservatives in office. Popular demand had had little influence on the treatment of the bill of 1866. Were the people now interested in Reform and would the interest thus far shown be a strong enough factor to force those who stood unmoved in the spring of 1866 to bring in a bill? An expression of opinion on the part of many of the leading magazines and newspapers, chosen somewhat at random, is suggestive of the answer.

¹The Times, December 21, 1866. The resolution was proposed by Mr. Allen of the Amalgamated Engineers.

²Stuart J. Reid, Memoirs of Sir Wemyss Reid (London, 1905), p. 113, tells of great crowds at Reform meetings.

The Spectator gave its opinion:

That puzzle . . . which in August so greatly perplexed the House, whether workmen do or do not desire to enter the Constitution, will be found to have become clear in sleep. In August, every one doubted, in February doubt will be a mark of political incapacity. The workmen do care, care so much that their foes have changed their tone, and instead of charging them with indifference, accuse them of revolutionary fervor and oppressiveness.¹

In its opinion delay was impossible. Macmillan's said:

It has become evident that the demand for reform is more deeply rooted than was at first hastily supposed—that it was not a cry got up by demagogues, nor the fancy of obstinate doctrinaires and fanatics. It cannot be suppressed by a few cynical sneers, nor by the exclamations of those political optimists, who hold the simple faith that whatever is, is right—especially the £10 franchise.²

¹ The Spectator, February 2, 1867, p. 118.

² Macmillan's, April, 1867, p. 529.

The Quarterly Review, strongly against Reform, pretended in January to believe that the clamor was "the result of the efforts of designing demagogues" ¹ but a little later gave a somewhat different version:

There can be no doubt that, as far as those who had no official reasons for passing a Reform Bill were concerned, the one dominant feeling of the present year has been a feverish anxiety to "settle the question." Mr. Henley, with cynical candor, betrayed the ignoble secret, when he acknowledged that a fear lest "the pot should boil over," was the motive that animated his friends. The meetings in the manufacturing towns, and the riots in Hyde Park, had had their effect. The comfortable classes had no stomach for a real struggle. Their hearts misgave them, indeed, about Reform; they saw in it ugly visions of the future—labor giving law to capital, Trades' Union rules supreme, democratic Parliaments contriving a graduated income tax, the poor voting supplies, and the rich finding ways and means. . . . They had beguiled themselves with the belief that it was possible to hold their rights without a struggle; and under that impression they had talked bravely for a time. But when they discovered their mistake, they took their overthrow meekly and gave up at once. All they entreated was that the agitation should be got rid of, and the question settled without delay. And Ministerial speakers boast of it as their great achievement that they have satisfied this one longing. "They have settled the question in a manner so liberal as to leave no room for further agitation." . . . The dullest of their antagonists perfectly understands that they have not yielded to argument or to sentiment; that the apostles of Reform who have the real credit of their conversion are the mobs who beat down the palings of Hyde Park or went out marching with bands and banners in the towns of the North. Any one who reads their organs in the press will be satisfied that there is no mistake among them upon this point; and indeed, they would hardly deserve credit for the ordinary sagacity of Englishmen if there was.¹

¹ Quarterly Review, January, 1867, p. 238.

The Fortnightly Review declared that "the argument can never be again used that the working classes do not care about Reform."²

The view in Frazer's varies somewhat from the statements given above; it contended that one couldn't tell just before the opening of the session whether Parliamentary Reform was or was not required by the nation, i. e., whether it was so imperatively required as to compel or justify the immediate introduction of a bill; that there prevailed a vague notion that something must be done; but in the absence of any definite scheme that suited either of the great parties, it was a mooted point whether the question could not be advantageously postponed; "whether the House of Commons, having just turned out one Government for meddling with it in the most dainty fashion, would turn out another for not meddling with it at all."³

Blackwood's in discussing the subject used such arguments as would justify the actions of the Conservative party. In the December number it was remarked that Reform must be dealt with soon, that within the last month matters had a good deal changed their aspect:

The feelings of the multitude are easily worked upon by such eloquence as has of late been addressed to them; and though the better informed among them may see that much of what was said is false, and a great deal more the merest clap-trap, still a residue abides of power enough to stir them into that state of dogged determination which leads to violence.⁴

¹ Ibid., October, 1867, pp. 555 and 556.

² Fortnightly Review, January, 1867, p. 104.

³ Frazer's, November, 1867, pp. 638 and 639.

⁴ Blackwood's, December, 1866, p. 783.

Blackwood's, of course, had no use for the Reform League, declaring that it was a fungus of yesterday's growth, and though very noxious, would have been harmless but for the recent adhesion to its views and principles of another body—the trade unions.¹ These had been converted by the management of their paid secretaries into political engines.² They were making common cause with the Reform League, and were walking in procession as well as meeting to hear speeches in support of manhood suffrage and vote by ballot. The transformation of trade unions into political leagues had thoroughly alarmed the middle classes.³ The blame must rest entirely with the three allied powers,—the Whigs, the Reform League, and the trade unions; the first by inciting the two latter to come forward; the two latter by the ostentatious display of physical force. It said that the meetings held were little short of rebellion if directed to overawe Parliament while in session, and advised that the same treatment should be given to Beales and Potter as had been given to O'Conner.⁴ The March issue claimed that shirking the question was impossible; that you might postpone Reform for a session,⁵

But what will the people say out of doors? It would be ridiculous to affirm now that the working classes are indifferent on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. Very many among them may wish that it had never been mooted; very many more may regret that they allowed themselves to be duped into joining the League. There they are, however; and whether they like it or not, the chiefs of the party will insist upon their going through with the work. To postpone legis-

¹ Ibid., January, 1867, p. 116.

² Ibid., January, 1867, p. 125.

³ Ibid., p. 131.

⁴ Ibid., p. 132.

⁵ Blackwood's, March, 1867, p. 379.

lation, therefore, . . . would be tantamount to challenging the masses to do their worst.¹

Finally in the May issue there was given a summary of the whole popular movement:

Derby had not been a week in office, before the broadest possible indications were given, that whatever his own disposition might be, the people were determined to have a change in the electoral system of the country. The formation of the Reform League, . . . the Hyde Park riot, all showed in what direction the wind was setting. Then came the recess, and with it Mr. Bright's progresses, Mr. Forster's announcements, Mr. Beales's proclamations, and the coalition, under Mr. Potter's guidance, of Trades-unions with the Reform League. It was impossible to believe, with this evidence before them, that the country was not in earnest in demanding a settlement of the Reform question. . . . The single point demanding attention was, How far shall we go?²

The Westminster Review agreed that Reform was necessary:

Since the advent of Lord Derby to power the duties of Reformers have been greatly simplified. The apathy for which the mass of the nation was formerly mocked has given place to an excitement far too intense to be allayed by palliatives. We do not blame the handicraftsmen for the energy they have displayed, nor are we astonished at the vehement language in which they express their feelings, and to which they give an attentive ear. That there should have been more appeals to argument and fewer threats about physical force would have pleased us better. . . . The agitation which now convulses England, the demonstrations which appal the timid without gratifying the brave and wise, are the legitimate fruits of the conduct and the speeches in which the dominant class has indulged during the past few years.¹

¹ Ibid., p. 387.

² Ibid., May, 1867.

It also stated that "friends of the present ministry are satisfied that if it does not propose a measure it will be compelled to resign."²

Finally, the Times, at the opening of Parliament, gave editorially its opinion upon the coming of Reform:

We are willing to admit that if the House of Commons could have the needful protection, and did not consist of gentlemen bound to tell how they vote, it would probably shelve the subject very soon. We are ready to admit that neither the landed nor the moneyed aristocracy wants Reform; that the middle class is indifferent to it; that the so-called working class only want it in order to strengthen their hands against their employers, and that the vast mass of agricultural and unskilled labor no more want to see Parliament reformed than to see the circle squared. . . . But the question is not going by argument. . . . The real state of the case is that we are on the eve of a battle, not of a controversy. . . . We are threatened with an immense combination of the Trades' Unions that shall rule the political as well as the industrial action of every member.³

But, it added—the cause is a good one.

Thus, from the consensus of opinions, it is apparent that the Conservatives were forced to take up the Reform question in the session of 1867. What had already taken place had scared the upper and middle classes, but these little acts, they were told, were merely dress rehearsals.⁴ The Con-

¹ Westminster Review, January, 1867, p. 185.

² Ibid., p. 187.

³ The Times, February 5, 1867, editorial.

⁴ Cf. letter of Robert Hartwell, secretary of the demonstration committee, in the Times, December 12, 1866.

servatives, refusing to deal with the question, could have resigned, but such action would have been playing into the hands of the Liberals. Hence the royal speech at the opening of Parliament mentioned that the state of the representation of the people would receive attention.¹

Public opinion made it necessary that the Reform question be taken up again and at once. The influence of the Reform League and kindred associations upon the legislation passed is quite a different question. In one sense that influence was very great; it marked any bill less liberal than the bill of 1866 as unsatisfactory; but had the franchise been given to those paying £5 in the towns, many of the Liberal leaders in the associations would have been willing to repeat John Bright's statement concerning the bill of 1866: "The Bill is an honest Bill; and if it is the least the Government could offer, it may be that it is the greatest which the Government could carry through Parliament." Whether those who wanted the whole loaf would have been able to keep the agitation going after some of the popular leaders had dropped out is, of course, doubtful. As it was, Disraeli did give pretty much the whole loaf but it cannot be said with certainty that he was forced to do so. Mr. Potter, speaking to Gladstone in behalf of a deputation of workmen representing various organizations of London artisans, said that the London workmen and their friends in the country called for a residential and registered manhood suffrage, but they did not feel bound to stick by that demand if such concessions were made to them as would permit their class being represented.² Another speaker said the working classes were willing to allow their claims for a residential and registered manhood suffrage to fall into abeyance for a time if lodger qualifications of, say four or five shillings a week, were adopted—a concession which was necessary inasmuch as it was next to impossible for workingmen in London to become householders. It was also said that the workingmen did not want to keep up the agitation, and many agreed that here was no necessity for the secret ballot—that it would burden the bill. Gladstone himself was strongly in favor of substituting a £5 rating franchise for the borough in place of household suffrage.¹ But such a proposition was not regarded as favorable to the working class.² Mr. Lucraft,³ speaking in July, complained that Mr. Bright and Mr. Gladstone and the Manchester party had been trying to do all they could to trip up the Government and make the bill one which would not enfranchise half those it now would—that the bill went too far for Mr. Bright and Mr. Gladstone who wanted the hard line, which would keep the people from the franchise. He said he would sooner depend upon a Tory Government than upon the Manchester party.⁴ Another speaker at the meeting said that he never had any faith in Mr. Bright, who had never said a word in favor of household suffrage; others disagreed with this sentiment, claiming that Bright had helped them,—in every speech since 1859 had always stood for household suffrage.

¹ Annual Register, 1867, p. 4.

² Cf. the Times, March 25, 1867.

On the other hand, the Reform League in February, when denouncing the Government scheme, had declared they were afraid the Liberals would accept halfway measures, in which case they would not stop the present agitation; that the country was behind them and they were prepared to fight not only the Government but the House of Commons itself.⁵ In fact, the meetings which went on during the

¹ Vide infra, pp. 206-7.

² Cf. Mr. Taylor's speech at the National Reform Union meeting, May 10, as given in the Times, May 11, 1867.

³ Vide supra, p. 101.

⁴ The Times, July 4, 1867.

⁵ Cf. the Times, February 28, 1867.

spring of 1867 as formerly were very decided in their criticisms of the bill. They probably did much to educate the Tory party. At the Reform League demonstration in London, February 11, where many thousands were present, the usual resolutions in favor of residential and registered manhood suffrage and the secret ballot were passed.¹ O'Donoghue, head of the Irish Reform League, said he had just come from the House of Commons and according to the impression left on his mind by Mr. Disraeli's speech, the Tory party intended, if they could, to smuggle a Reform bill through the House of Commons without consulting the people, whereupon his audience cried, "We shall turn them out."² He also showed the necessity for the people of England and Ireland to unite in their efforts for Reform. As for the resolutions³ which the Conservative Government offered early in the session, these were called by a Birmingham Reform meeting an insult to the country, were spoken of by delegates of the Reform League as wholly unsuited to meet the exigencies of the present crisis, and by the Working Men's Association as a mockery and an insult.⁴ At a Reform demonstration in Trafalgar Square (March 2, 1867) Mr. Potter declared that they would have a meeting every Saturday for some weeks to come. In the course of his speech he said that the Tory Standard advised the Government to consent to a measure and

When they found the Tory press advising household suffrage it showed that the working classes had screwed the Tory Government up pretty tightly. . . . They would hold a few more of these meetings, and then, if they found that did not do, he thought they would have to suggest to the whole of the work-

¹ The Times, February 12, 1867.

² Annual Register, 1867, chronicle, p. 22.

³ Vide infra, p. 193.

⁴ This sentiment was echoed at many meetings.

ing classes throughout the country a week's cessation from business and . . . then he should advise all the working men to walk about the streets of this great metropolis day after day, and stop all the traffic, and stop all business, and in fact, render themselves a public nuisance. . . . He did not advocate physical force, but after the money which had been expended, and the sacrifices which the working classes had made, to prove that they were earnest in their demands, and to show the justice of their being entitled to the franchise, delay was dangerous.¹

The Reformers at Bradford thought the entire conduct of the Government on the question of Reform deserving of the strongest reprobation and urged the Liberal party to bring about the downfall of the present ministry.²

The Conservatives on the eighteenth of March finally brought in a bill based on household suffrage but with many fancy franchises appended and Mr. Potter at Trafalgar Square on the nineteenth of March called the bill political jugglery.³ Here a resolution was passed "that in the opinion of this meeting the Government Reform bill is a mockery and insult to the people, so bad and vicious in principle as to be incapable of being satisfactorily amended in committee; this meeting, therefore, trusts it will not be allowed to pass a second reading, as to do so would be so much time thrown away." At a meeting at Birmingham⁴ the recognition of household suffrage as the basis of the franchise in the boroughs was accepted with great satisfaction; but it was pointed out that the advantages were neutralized by the condition which limited the right of voting to those occupiers who paid local rates directly, and by the unwise

¹ The Times, March 4, 1867.

² The Times, March 4, 1867.

³ Ibid., March 20, 1867.

⁴ On March 22; cf. the Times of March 23, 1867.

innovation of dual voting. Many were the protests, too, against the residence clause.¹ The London Working Men's Association pledged itself (April 16) in the event of the bill passing through Parliament in its present shape—requiring a personal payment of rates and a residential qualification of two years, with the omission of a lodger franchise—to a continued and increased agitation until personal payment of rates should be abolished, the term of residence reduced, and the principles of residential and registered manhood suffrage, protected by the ballot, be acknowledged by the Legislature.² It also was firmly against the £5 rating amendment which Gladstone upheld. At a great Reform demonstration at Birmingham (April 22) a resolution stated that while the meeting desired to maintain peace, law, and order in the country, it did believe that the continued obstructions to Reform, and the treachery of the House of Commons in reference to the great constitutional question, would tend to exasperate a loyal and industrious people and, if persevered in, would ultimately lead to anarchy and revolution.³

The Reformers, however, showed their pleasure at the changes made in the bill which were favorable to them. At the Hyde Park meeting of May 6, O'Donoghue moved the following resolutions:

That this meeting, whilst still adhering to registered and residential manhood suffrage, protected by the ballot, as the only really efficient measure of Reform in the representation of the people, hails with satisfaction the withdrawal . . . of Lord Grosvenor's proposed amendment,⁴ and the majority of 81

¹ Six months was wanted instead of two years; cf. infra, p. 200.

² The Times, April 17, 1867.

³ The Times, April 23, 1867.

⁴ Earl Grosvenor had given notice of an amendment to substitute a £5 rating for household suffrage.

on the same evening against the two years' residence clause in the Government bill, and earnestly calls upon the House of Commons to make that bill a more full and honest measure for the execution of the franchise by expunging from it the rate-paying clauses, equalizing the borough and country franchises on the principle of household suffrage, and introducing a provision giving a vote to lodgers, or else to reject that bill altogether.¹

This meeting, however, is more important for the history of the rights of public meetings than for the history of Reform. The Government, after warning the Reformers not to use Hyde Park as a meeting place, decided that it had taken a wrong position, and, although arrangements had been made that nearly five thousand of the metropolitan police massed together in the park should prevent a second Hyde Park episode, did permit the meeting. Colonel Dickson addressed his "fellow-trespassers," but not on the subject of Reform; he was positively sick of the subject. He thought the game was in their hands now. "You have done the trick. Don't undo it. Be steady and be orderly. Give the lie to your traducers." And the well-attended meeting did go off quietly.

On the seventeenth of May, an amendment to the bill which did away with the compound householder² was accepted by the Conservative Government and a great obstruction to real household suffrage had gone. Shortly afterwards the Times awoke to the knowledge that the nation was at the foot of a precipice; ¹ how the descent had been made it knew not; nor, indeed, was it entirely sure that the nation had not received any hurts; only one thing was certain—the nation was at the foot of the precipice.

¹ The Times, May 7, 1867.

² Compound householders (comprising more than a third of the entire number of householders) were those who made an agreement with their landlord by which their rates were paid to the landlord. The latter, for the trouble of collecting, was given a percentage off by the authorities and, therefore, charged his tenants not the full rate but a reduced (i. e., a composition) rate. The tenants who compounded, however, did not usually have their names on the register and could not vote, and Disraeli with his cry of "personal payment of rates" had found no convenient method of enfranchising them except by agreeing to the amendment which abolished compounding and had all pay rates "personally" and thus put on the register.

The Reform League was, of course, quite willing to recognize its own importance in this victory for the Reformers. Mr. Beales said "it was the greatest farce for Mr. Disraeli to say there would be a Reform Bill of any kind but for the agitation of the Reform League. The Reform League were the real authors of the Bill." ² Others, too, were impressed with the League's influence. Goldwin Smith in writing to the Secretary of the League said:

It is impossible to doubt that the popular movement, so effectively and, at the same time, so legally and peacefully conducted by the two combined associations has been the main instrument in turning the present holders of power from the opponents of the limited Reform Bill of last Session into the advocates of household suffrage and something more. I say of something more, because the lodger franchise plainly interdicts and must in the end break up the restrictive principles of the present Bill.³

Disraeli was not keen to acknowledge the influence of an association many of whose leading members were affiliated with the Liberal party. Rather was it to his interests to have the Conservative party recognized as the important factor in granting the franchise. That some of the workmen were grateful to him for the part he had played was proved by the deputation of artisans to the Government on the eighth of June, which expressed itself as opposed to the Reform League but "hoped that artisans would show their gratitude to the Government which had enfranchised them."¹ Already a Conservative League had been formed² and a deputation had assured³ Disraeli that Conservative feeling was spreading throughout the country—a fact of which he had convincing proof in connection with seventeen associations which the workingmen of Yorkshire had joined because they felt that his party was the true and only friend of the working classes. Goldwin Smith saw the head of the Tory Government "decoying the workingmen, who a few months ago were being reviled amid the vociferous cheers of the Tory party, into an alliance with the Tory oligarchy against the middle and commercial classes."

¹ The Times, May 30, 1867, editorial.

² Report of League meeting in the Times of May 30, 1867.

³ Given in the Times, June 17, 1867.

It was, of course, recognized that the suffrage was desired as a means to an end.⁴ Many speeches already quoted tend to show this. It was felt that a reformed House would do away, in part, with class government, or would at least give the working class an opportunity to have its grievances heard; that some serious "social maladies" would be helped or cured; that the economic conditions due to the acts of the middle and upper classes would be improved. Class government and many of the social evils could have been and were complained of during most of the preceding years of the nineteenth century. The terrible economic distress causing suffering and irritation had been brought in great part by the panic of May, 1866, the effects of which were very patent during the autumn of 1866 and the whole of 1867.

¹ The Times, June 10, 1867.

² Notice in the Times, April 30, 1867; cf. also News of the World, May 5, 1867.

³ Cf. the Times, May 1, 1867.

⁴ Cf. editorial of the Times, June 17, 1867.

Complaints against class government were frequent. That it was unjust¹ to refuse to labor the tribunals given so freely to capital, unjust not to legalize and regulate trade unions as unions of apothecaries, surgeons and barristers were legalized and regulated, was the feeling of many. It was said² that probably a reformed Parliament would take a little more pains to help on the improvements of the dwellings of the lower class, and a little less to compensate land-owners for the cattle plague.³ "Even their (i. e., the Liberals') most advanced politician, John Bright," wrote an artisan to the Times, "cannot so far forget his class and the class that vote for him as to propose the repeal of the Master and Servant Act and will probably vote for an Adulterate amendment instead of repeal."⁴ To many, the words of the pamphleteer sounded like an axiom: "We have the germs of a representative Government, and we know that this, like truth brought to light, will always represent itself, and advance the interests, and the interests only, that it represents."⁵

Complaints against other "social sores" were not few in number. The state of the great cities and of the laborers' homes therein was described⁶ as heart-rending: in many of the towns and especially in the metropolis, the number of persons who herded together in habitations scarcely ventilated, drained imperfectly or not at all, with no water supply and, in reference to the filth, indecency, and pestilential condition of which, no language can be too unmeasured, had to be reckoned by hundreds of thousands. In the rural ¹Cf. the Spectator, January 19, 1867.

²*Macmillan's*, April, 1867, p. 533.

³*Vide supra*, p. 65.

⁴The Times, August 29, 1866.

⁵W. F. Stanley, Proposition for a New Reform Bill, p. 7.

⁶Cf. Fortnightly Review, vol. vii, pp. 269 et seq.

districts the great proportion lived in hovels. Landowners in these sections were unwilling to allow cottages to be built upon their property lest the rates be increased; in the cities the workingmen had not money with which to buy land for dwellings.¹ In any case the government did nothing.

The deficiencies of the educational system were mentioned time and again.² The North British Review in a discussion of the subject said:

The notorious facts cannot be gainsaid,—that our agricultural population is for the most part uninstructed mentally, and undeveloped even to stupidity; that a very large proportion of our town population never go near a school, and grow up in absolute brutality; that not one-half of the children of fitting age are to be found under instruction, and that of those who do attend or have attended school with tolerable regularity, a large proportion have their education cut short at an age which leaves little prospect of their retaining what they have acquired, and that these have few opportunities of supplementing their deficiencies in later years. In short, among the working classes, taking the country through, a fair and useful degree of instructedness . . . is the exception and not the rule, while the mass, reckoning them by the millions, is deplorably and disgracefully without the rudiments of culture.³

Pauperism, too, was a great crying evil. One tenth of our revenue, one twentieth of the population—said one writer⁴—sink in the abyss. Bright declared that the ruling classes in England had miserably failed; there were 1,200,000 paupers in the country.⁵ And the winter of 1866 and 1867,

¹ The North British Review, new series, vol. viii (1867), pp. 514 and 515.

² Cf. Fortnightly Review, September 15, 1866; Frazer's, November, 1866.

³ The North British Review, new series, vol. viii (1867), "The Social Sores of Great Britain," pp. 512 and 513.

⁴ Frederic Harrison in the Fortnightly Review, vol. vii, p. 271.

⁵ John Bright, Speeches on Parliamentary Reform (London, 1866), speech at Glasgow, p. 32.

it will be remembered, was a time when pauperism was increasing greatly in comparison with the winter of the preceding year. The increase was felt to be due to the financial panic.¹ Indeed, added to those "social maladies" which a reformed House would partially or completely cure, were those ailments vaguely called economic, which this same reformed House must relieve.

What, in summary, can be said as to the influence of popular demand upon the Reform movement? In the early 'sixties, it has been pointed out, there was no agitation. But events happening at home and abroad were not unfavorable to Reform; at home a more liberal ministry came into power with the death of Palmerston in 1865; in America, a democratic North sympathized with by the English workingmen, had conquered an aristocratic South; Italy was well on the way to unification under a somewhat liberal government; in Germany, it was said, Bismarck was granting an extensive suffrage. There were those who thought that England should grant privileges to her working classes. The Reform League, formed in 1865, tried by the help of such orators as John Bright, W. E. Forster and other radical Liberals to start an agitation. The attempt was not very successful, however, and only once—during the Easter recess of 1866—did it appear as if the country had been stirred. The agitation, such as it was, soon diminished, and the House of Commons seemed to be quite unmoved. But with the defeat of the bill of 1866, numerous Reform meetings again were held. The arguments of Lowe, applicable against any extension of the suffrage, aroused the working classes; distress and discontent with the economic condition followed the commercial panic in May; the Hyde Park incident advertised the Reform question throughout the land in a most striking manner. The Reform League, having gained an advantage at Hyde Park, followed up this success by calling together the workingmen in orderly but monster Reform meetings during the autumn of 1866. On most occasions John Bright was the chief speaker. The press already alarmed for the welfare of the country because of the activity of the Fenians, thought the nation had cause to worry when the trade unions came out strongly for Reform. The Conservative Government, reading "the signs of the times" found it necessary to introduce a new Reform bill. Bright had written to Disraeli telling him that a Tory Reform bill must be acceptable to the Commons and the Reform associations. A bill containing a £5 borough and a £10 or £12 county franchise clause, he thought, would be acceptable to both. Disraeli, who, to stop the agitation, had to grant at least these conditions, did follow much more closely the various requests and demands of Reform speakers. The various reasons assigned for his actions will be discussed later. Any history of the Reform bill of 1867 which fails to take into account the influence of the agitation of the working class and especially of that part of the working class represented by the trade unions is incomplete.

¹ Vide, for instance, in the Times, January 14, 1867, the letter of W. M. Bullivant; vide, also, the Times, January 22, 1867.

CHAPTER IV

THE OFFICIAL ATTITUDE TOWARD REFORM

As opposed to the popular attitude toward Reform there must be taken into consideration the official attitude toward the question. By official attitude is meant not only the attitude of those men chosen to carry on the Government of the country, but the attitude of all the members of the House of Commons either as individuals or as combined in parties. Inasmuch as there was little popular pressure during the period that the Reform bill of 1866 was under consideration, a study of the action of the parties and of the arguments used for and against Reform on that occasion may well serve to show what official England thought of the Reform question.

It has already been pointed out that Palmerston, the head of the Government during the early 'sixties, was against any extension of the suffrage. He was a statesman of the old English aristocratic type, and stood for liberalism on the Continent but against any democratic government for England. The two great parties as a whole backed up his administration; they said that they were for a "well-considered measure of reform," as "opposed to any revolutionary change," but at the same time declared it useless to take up the question so long as the public was not interested. It was a period when there prevailed so great a harmony of tone between Whig and Tory that one could scarcely distinguish them.¹ As the Annual Register said:

¹The Westminster Review, "Parliament and Reform," April, 1865, p. 503; Quarterly Review, "The Six Year Old Parliament," July, 1865.

The spirit of party . . . appeared to have lost nearly all its acrimony, and even a large share of its vitality, both in Parliament and in the country at large; it seemed as if few questions remained to divide in any material degree the opinions of the different sections of politicians. Some of the prominent men on either side of the House of Commons did not hesitate openly to avow their indifference to party bonds and watch-words.¹

The Government, moreover, enjoyed to a great degree, public confidence.

But with the death of Palmerston in October, 1865, there came a change. It was the opinion of the Annual Register that none of his colleagues, however powerful in intellect or mature in experience, was likely to equal the departed chief in that address and tact so necessary to hold together the somewhat diverse elements of the Liberal party in the House of Commons.² And, where, indeed, would be found the statesman who could remove the fears or conciliate the support of the Opposition, for the Conservative party, in spite of its attempt at Reform in 1859, was strongly against any radical change!

Earl Russell, head of the new ministry, was, it was said, by birth, by education, by family traditions and political connection a Whig of the usual conviction, believing that the real Constitution of England was an oligarchical Constitution.³ It is true that he had stood for Reform many times since 1832, but too often he had not been over-energetic in the cause. Besides he was growing old and would need much assistance from Gladstone, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Gladstone was, indeed, the man on whom much hinged. Entering Parliament as a Tory he had gone over to the Liberal side, not, as he said,¹ by any arbitrary act, but by the slow and resistless forces of conviction. Since his suffrage speech of 1864² the Conservatives had become very suspicious of him, and many of the Radicals had pretended to see in him a convert.³ The Quarterly Review in writing on the situation said:

¹ Annual Register, 1864, p. 3.

² Annual Register, 1865, p. 159.

³ Vide Blackwood's, "The New Ministry," August, 1866, p. 262. On characteristics of Russell, cf. Walpole, Life of Lord John Russell, vol. ii, p. 409.

The real and pressing danger of Mr. Gladstone's leadership will undoubtedly be his newly-formed views upon Reform. Or rather, to put it more generally, there will be the dangers arising from any Liberal majority when once the restraining influence of Lord Palmerston is taken away. It must not be forgotten that the Liberal party differs from the Conservative party in this, that it is not a homogeneous body. In the Conservative party there may be here and there individual eccentricities. . . . It is an old remark that the Whigs and the Radicals differ more from each other, in point of political opinion, than the Whigs and the Conservatives.⁴

Indeed, it would be more in accordance with the facts to make a threefold division of the Liberal party rather than the mentioned twofold division of Radicals and Whigs. There were the Liberals proper, following party bonds and party creeds, whipped into line under Gladstone. There was a conservative element, opposed upon principle to any extension of the suffrage. Finally the Radical party, to which reference has been made before, stood strongly for a change in the franchise qualifications.

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 130, debate of April 27, 1866.

² Cf. supra, p. 37.

³ Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, pp. 127 et seq.; vide, also, Quarterly Review, July, 1865.

⁴ Quarterly Review, July, 1865, p. 291.

Robert Lowe, member for Calne, came during the sessions of 1866 and 1867, to be the great leader of the conservative element in the Liberal party. Although he had been a member of the ministry of 1860, when Lord Russell introduced a Reform bill, his hostility to the 1866 bill was based on an anti-democratic principle. Back of him were to stand about forty Liberals,¹—enough to defeat the bill and turn out the ministry. Their attitude caused Bright to write of the “forty thieves” and the “forty traitors”² and to them was applied generally the name “Adullamites.”³

John Bright was the leader of the Radicals. “Radical” as applied to Bright must be used with quotations since, in some important respects, he was not progressive. For instance, he was willing enough to confess to his opposition to factory legislation for adults, male and female. But he was a non-conformist and he had joined Cobden in the fight against the Corn Laws. The term “Radical,” however, was applied because he was doing all in his power to procure the franchise for the working class—a matter in which Cobden did not display unusual activity. His work during the 'fifties was important and when the bill of 1866 was brought in, he was willing to accept it as the best the Government could give at that time.

Such were the factions which Gladstone must keep together if he were to pass a Reform bill. According to the Grey Papers,⁴ Gladstone, in talking with the Speaker of the House of Commons, admitted that there was no strong feeling for Reform among his constituents, but his majority of ¹For list vide Harris, History of the Radical Party in Parliament, pp. 471 and 473.

²Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, p. 356.

³For origin of term vide infra, p. 147.

⁴October 22, 1865; quoted from Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, pp. 198 and 199.

eighty bothered him. "They," he said, "will expect some action;"—to which the Speaker answered:

No doubt a majority of eighty, agreed on any point, would expect action. At the time of the first Reform bill, when the whole party was for the bill, the course was clear. But is the party agreed now? The point it was agreed upon was to support Lord Palmerston's government. But was that in order to pass a strong measure of reform? Suppose that the country is satisfied with the foreign policy, and the home policy, and the financial policy, and wants to maintain these and their authors, and does not want great changes of any kind?

Whatever Gladstone may have believed about the popular attitude, the Government of which he was the conspicuous figure, brought in a Reform bill on March 12, 1866. Friends said that his action was due to firm conviction that the working class was not represented in any proportion to their numbers and in accordance with their share of the income of the country;¹ by others it was declared that he was led on by Russell who felt he must take up the question or be guilty of forfeiting a pledge.² Enemies of the administration suggested that political advantages had become an important factor.³ The Radicals had gained⁴ somewhat at the election of 1865, and though yet a small minority, they were⁵ an energetic and resolute party who were making the Reform question their platform. The Liberals, after the death of Palmerston, needed some added strength.

¹ Cf. statement of Quarterly Review, July, 1866, p. 265.

² Cf. Frazer's, January, 1866, p. 6, and William Rathbone, The Rock Ahead (Edinburgh and London, 1867), p. 5.

³ Quarterly Review, July, 1866, p. 266.

⁴ James Howard Harris Malmesbury, Memoirs of an Ex-Minister; an Autobiography, 2 vols. (London, 1884), vol. ii, p. 340.

⁵ Frazer's, August, 1865, p. 136.

Therefore, said the Opposition press, they surrendered to the Radicals and appointed Mr. Goschen and Mr. Forster to the Government.¹ As for the bill they brought in,—that was but the great game of twenty-five years ago played over again²—an attempt to keep the influence of the party from waning by handing out the franchise little by little to grateful constituents. Mr. Forster, however, at a Reform meeting at Bradford, in November, 1865, gave a summary of his opinion on internal politics and Reform, and, of course, did not make mention of any advantages which might accrue to those passing the bill. He considered Reform in the ascendant because: (1) Palmerston was no longer Premier; (2) Russell was the head of the Government; (3) Gladstone was leader of the House of Commons and had been rejected by Oxford; (4) a large majority of the new House of Commons had actually pledged themselves to Reform in their election addresses; (5) a new Parliament and a new ministry was ready for work, and “there is more hope in the new than in the old, of which indeed, there was no hope.”³ On the other hand there were certain signs of opposition; there were many waverers in the Liberal ranks. Many did not want Reform though ready to vote for it, if necessary. All were afraid of being sent adrift by the bill and of losing their dearly bought seats after one or two years of unquiet possession.

The bill was brought in on March twelfth. After that portion of the Queen’s speech which referred to Reform had been read by the clerk, the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose in a House crowded with curious members and strangers to state its provisions. Few ministers — said he ¹ — have risen in recent years to address this House under greater difficulties than those which at this moment attend my own position and present task. Although the difficulties be concentrated in their greatest weight upon us, yet, they are not ours alone. The interest in the successful solution of this problem is an interest common to the whole House of Commons, and to every party, and every section of a party that sits within these walls. By no less than five administrations, and in no less than five Queen's speeches before that of the present year, the House of Commons has been acquainted by the sovereign, under the advice of her constitutionally appointed ministers, that the time, in their judgment, had arrived when the representation of the people ought to undergo revision. The election of a new Parliament naturally made the Government feel that the time had arrived when it was right that the sense of representatives of the people should again be taken in regard to the laws which regulated the electoral system. The duty of the Government in this respect was a very plain one. Hence they had taken measures to obtain information which could throw light on the case. The statistics obtained showed that the working class, which ought, owing to its advance in education, in social conduct, in self-command and power of endurance, and avidity for knowledge, to have borne an increasing and growing proportion has borne a dwindling and diminishing proportion to the whole number of the town constituency.

¹ Quarterly Review, January, 1866, pp. 252-253; vide also J. H. Murchison, The Conservatives and “Liberals,” p. xii.

² Blackwood’s, February, 1866, pp. 144 et seq.

³ As discussed in an editorial of the Times, November 25, 1865; for the speech, vide the Times, November 24, 1865.

As to the measure itself—was it to be complete? Would it deal with the franchise in England and in Wales, in Scotland, and in Ireland? Would it take into consideration that whole group of questions included in the common phrase, "redistribution of seats?" Would it treat of the question of the boundary of boroughs? Would it concern itself with the corrupt practises at elections and with the administrative machinery for registration and for the holding of elections? Inasmuch as time and space are not yet annihilated, declared the Chancellor of the Exchequer, such a measure cannot now be discussed. He thought it quite impossible to do more than to look at what came first in the order of importance, the electoral franchise. According to his proposal the occupation franchise in the counties was to be reduced from £50 to £14. This was an occupation franchise, not of land alone but of a house with land. It was calculated that 172,000 voters would be added, but from the middle class, since the number of persons properly belonging to the working classes who had a £14 rental franchise would be so very small as not to be worth taking into calculation. Copyholders and leaseholders having property within limits of boroughs were to be allowed to vote in the county within which it lay under the same condition as freeholders.¹ By a savings-bank franchise for adult male depositors of £50 who possessed that deposit for two years, 10,000 to 15,000 persons were to be added. Such a special franchise would have its principal operation in the counties. In the town constituencies some 60,000 persons above the £10 line were to be enfranchised by abolishing the law allowing landlords by arrangement with the parish officers to pay rates for rate-paying householders, by new provisions causing the compound householders to be treated like rate-paying householders, and by putting lodgers who occupied rooms of the clear annual value of £10 on the same footing as those holding tenements. For enfranchisement below the line the clear annual value as determined by the gross estimated rental was taken as the basis.² Because a £6 rental would give ¹ Freeholders in boroughs who did not occupy their property could vote in the county in which the borough was situated.

¹ Cf. Hansard, vol. clxxxii, pp. 19 et seq.

² The gross estimated rental is defined by the 25 and 26 Vict., c. 103

242,000 new voters and would place the working class in a majority, a proposal to use such a figure, thought the Chancellor of Exchequer, would not be agreeable to Parliament. Hence a clear annual value of £7 was chosen as the dividing line. By such a provision 144,000 would be enfranchised, who, taken with those of the working class now voting, 126,000, and those to be added above the £10 line, 60,000, would make a total of 330,000 voters belonging to the working class as against 362,000 voters of classes other than the working class. The bill in itself would enfranchise 204,000 persons in the towns, and 172,000 in the counties, not including about 24,000 added by clauses relating to the copyhold, leasehold, and savings-bank franchises, or 400,000 altogether.¹ Apropos of the proportion of the new constituency to the total householders, it was said that the actual constituency represented 36 per cent of the male occupiers, that the proposed constituency would represent 51 per cent of those male occupiers, and that of the working classes there would be in the towns 330,000 enfranchised against 588,000 unenfranchised. A clause disqualifying from voting, persons employed in the government yards while so employed, was also promised.

In conclusion the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

If issue is taken adversely upon this Bill, I hope it will be above all a plain and direct issue. I trust it will be taken upon the question whether there is or is not to be an enfranchisement downwards, if it is to be taken at all. . . . We canto be "the rent at which the hereditament might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenants' rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rent charge, if any;" a rateable value was obtained from the gross estimated rental by making various deductions (which varied extremely in different places).

¹There was much disagreement over Gladstone's statistics. Many members of the House of Commons thought the proportion of workingmen greater than shown, others much less.

not consent to look upon this large addition, considerable although it may be, to the political power of the working classes of this country as if it were an addition fraught with mischief and with danger. We cannot look, and we hope no man will look, upon it as upon some Trojan horse approaching the walls of the sacred city, and filled with armed men, bent upon ruin, plunder, and conflagration. We cannot join in comparing it with that monstrum infelix—we cannot say—“—scandit fatalis machina muros,

Foeta armis: mediaeque minans illabitur urbi.”

I believe that those persons whom we ask you to enfranchise ought rather to be welcomed as you would welcome recruits to your army or children to your family.

The reception of the measure on the first night could not have been gratifying to the ministry. Mr. Laing, usually a supporter of the Government, was opposed to reopening a question which he thought had been settled long since, and at a period of the session when there was not time to give full and fair consideration to the whole subject.¹ He had thought it advisable to express the opinions he had, because he believed they were held by many of the moderate Liberal party and he felt bound to express his deep disappointment that the Government had resolved to deal with the matter piecemeal, and not by one comprehensive measure. The House was asked to support the bill on pledges given some years ago. For himself he had given no pledge on entering Parliament but a promise generally to support Lord Palmerston's administration, and he did not feel disposed to violate that pledge, either in the letter or the spirit. Would Lord Palmerston have consented, in the face of the returns recently presented to the House, to introduce a measure proposing to lower the franchise without redistributing the seats, to reopen an agitation the issue of which none could foresee, to offer them a Reform bill which was not final and contained no element of security?

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii, pp. 75 et seq.

On the same evening, Mr. Horsman also showed the attitude of the conservative faction of the Liberal party. He attacked the bill as the work of Bright—it was, in short, the old battle revived—the Member for Birmingham and Lord Russell against the majority of the Cabinet and the country. Judging Bright by his political principles, he was not an Englishman but an alien, not a believer in the British Constitution, but as ardent a Republican as President Johnson himself.¹ Bright, however, proved himself able during the following debates to retort effectively to any and all slurs. On the thirteenth of March Mr. Lowe in a well prepared speech showed himself to be in harmony with Mr. Horsman and Mr. Laing. He spoke against any extension of the franchise. Seldom in the nineteenth century was any speaker to utter in Parliament words more significant of opposition to thorough-going democracy than these spoken by Lowe on this occasion:

Let any Gentleman consider the constituencies he has had the honor to be concerned with. If you want venality, if you want ignorance, if you want drunkenness and facility for being intimidated; or if, on the other hand, you want impulsive, unreflecting, and violent people, where do you look for them in the constituencies? Do you go to the top or to the bottom? It is ridiculous for us to allege that since the Reform Bill the sins of the constituencies or the voters are mainly comprised between £20 and £10. But, then, it has been said the £10 shopkeepers, and lodginghouse keepers, and beerhouse keepers, are an indifferent class of people; but get to the artizan, and there you will see the difference. It is a sort of theory the ancients had about the north wind. The ancients observed that as they went further to the north the wind got colder. Colder and colder it got the further they went, just as the constituencies get worse and worse the nearer you approach £10. They reasoned in this way—If it is so cold when you are in front of the north wind, how very warm it would be if you could only get behind it. And, therefore, they imagined for themselves a blessed land we have all read of, where the people, called the Hyperboreans, were always perfectly warm, happy and virtuous, because they had got to the other side of the north wind. It is the same view that my right honorable Friend takes with respect to the £10 franchise—if you go a little lower you get into the virtuous stratum. We know what those persons are who live in small houses—we have had experience of them under the name of “freemen”—and no better law, I think, could have been passed than that which disfranchised them altogether.¹

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii, pp. 90-114.

Such words quoted as a whole or in part by opponents of Lowe became far more effective as a means of stirring up the working classes than as any obstacle to democratic tendencies.²

The members of the Radical wing were of course not any too pleased with the actions and words of the dissenters. Mr. Fawcett referred to Mr. Horsman as an “honorable gentleman who sits on the Liberal benches, and is always enthusiastically cheered by the Conservatives who sit on the opposite side of the House.”³ Bright suggested that Lowe was resentful because out of office:

“For who, to dumb forgetfulness a prey,
That pleasing, anxious office e’er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the Treasury,
Nor cast one longing, lingering look behind?”⁴

As for Horsman:

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii, pp. 147-148.

² Cf. supra, p. 100.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 200.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxii, p. 219.

The right honorable Gentleman is the first of the new party who has expressed his great grief by his actions—who has retired into what may be called his political cave of Adullam—and he has called about him every one that was in distress and every one that was discontented. The right honorable Gentleman has been long anxious to form a party in this House. There is scarcely at this side of the House any one who is able to address the House with effect or to take much part in our debates that he has not tried to bring over to his party or cabal—and lastly, the right honorable Gentleman has succeeded in hooking the right honorable Gentleman the member for Calne (Mr. Lowe). I know there was an opinion expressed many years ago by a member of the Treasury Bench and of the Cabinet, that two men would make a party. When a party is formed of two men so amiable and so disinterested as the two right honorable Gentlemen, we may hope to see for the first time in Parliament a party perfectly harmonious and distinguished by mutual and unbroken trust. But there is one difficulty which it is impossible to remove. This party of two is like the Scotch terrier that was so covered with hair that you could not tell which was the head and which was the tail.¹

The reference to the cave of Adullam² was at once made use of. Those of the Liberals who opposed the bill and joined forces with Lowe, Horsman and Laing were given the name of Adullamites³—a name which lasted until a

¹ Ibid., vol. clxxxii, pp. 219-220.

² 1 Samuel 22: 1-2 reads:

"David therefore departed thence, and escaped to the cave Adullam: and when his brethren and all his father's house heard it, they went down thither to him.

"And everyone that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and everyone that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them: and there were with him about four hundred men."

³ J. F. Rhodes, in the History of the United States, vol. iv, p. 464, relates how in 1864 Lincoln when told by a friend of the nomination of Frémont for president by a few hundred men, opened his Bible and read the passage just quoted (1 Sam. 22: 2).

Reform bill had been passed. Apropos of the bill, Bright said that he was not able to find a point in it which he had recommended; that he believed in a household franchise for the boroughs; that he was not for a £14 franchise in the county and not for a savings-bank franchise and that he did not trust Gladstone's statistics concerning the number of workingmen on the register. He did not think the bill sufficient but gave it his support. This gentle censure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to Viscount Cranborne to give the House an exhibition of a lover's quarrel.¹ At the close of the evening's debate (March 13), the bill was presented and read the first time.

But the great contest of the session commenced on the twelfth of April. The debates characterized by so conspicuous a display of Parliamentary oratory as perhaps no occasion in recent times had produced,² were continued for eight nights. On the first day the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the second reading. He promised to present bills upon the Scotch and Irish franchise and upon the redistribution of seats before going into committee upon this bill. Earl Grosvenor, Adullamite, moved an amendment to the effect that a bill for reducing the franchise could not be discussed until the entire scheme contemplated by the Government for the amendment of the representation of the people was presented. The Government, he thought, put itself open, upon this question, to the charge of deserting its party, when in bringing forward a measure of Reform it consulted mainly and in the first instance, the feelings and wishes of the Radicals.

The debaters had considerable to say upon the amendment but devoted much more time to a consideration of the whole question of Reform.³ Lord Stanley, Conservative, in seconding the amendment, spoke in favor of suspending the entire question until 1867, when it might be taken up at the very beginning of the session.¹ The objections of the Adullamites and Conservatives were many. They claimed that, by bringing forward only part of the measure, the Government asked the House to put trust in them while they refused to put trust in the House; that they saw "the House of Commons managed as pious missionaries manage their savage converts, not telling them too much for fear of embarrassing their simple minds";² that the House when called upon to vote for a measure which depended on another measure was really asked to resign its functions as a deliberative assembly, and to place a blind confidence in ministers. It was to ask the assembly to jump at once to the ultimatum to which universal suffrage would finally lead it; namely, the separate and independent dictation of the Executive. Arguments were used against legislation by "piecemeal," as an unusual and unconstitutional procedure. Besides, taking up the franchise before the redistribution of seats would make the absurdity and anomaly of the small boroughs more glaring. And, it was said, there was no certainty that there would be the same ministry in office next year to complete the measure, should the franchise bill pass this session.

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii, p. 225.

² Opinion of Annual Register, 1866, p. 117.

³ Vide infra for arguments for and against Reform.

The Liberals, of course, gave reply to the objections and were not slow to point out³ that whereas the amendment was for a more nearly complete measure, many arguments used were against Reform. Mr. Forster declared that most of those speaking against the amendment had discussed the merits of the bill, although the amendment expressly stated that it was inexpedient to do so till the whole bill was before the House.¹ They had shown why the franchise should not be reduced, or why it should not be reduced in the manner proposed in the bill. What they should have done, therefore, was to propose an amendment, declaring that it was inexpedient for the House to pass the bill. But they knew that it would not have answered their purpose to meet the question in this direct way. Mr. Bright declared that the bill that was not before them was made an excuse and weapon for destroying the bill that was before them,² and Mr. Layard³ pointed out that the country at large was feeling that the real issue at stake was, not whether the bill proposed by the Government or any other bill should pass, but whether the question of Reform should be entertained at all⁴ — a statement of fact which corresponds closely with the evidence of the leading speakers and writers out of doors.

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii, p. 1169.

² Mr. Gregory, Hansard, vol. clxxxii, p. 1799.

³ In addition to speeches given, vide Mr. W. E. Baxter's speech, Hansard, vol. clxxxii, pp. 1227-1237.

In addition to the time needed for the speeches for and against the bill, and for and against the amendment, much attention was given to the opinions, the inconsistencies of thought and action, and the conduct of individual members. John Bright, because of his prominence in the Reform question and because it was assumed that he had influenced the Government to bring in the single-barrelled bill, came in for so much attention that one⁵ of the members declared he must speak of Bright lest he be open to the accusation of having neglected a form, the constant observance of which by preceding speakers led him to conclude that it was one of courtesy and etiquette. Lord Elcho, an Adullamite, made⁶

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16, 1866), p. 1387.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 23, 1866), p. 1876.

³ Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16, 1866), p. 1424.

⁵ Captain Grosvenor, Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 29.

⁶ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1674.

a speech against the tyranny of the Saul on the Treasury Benches,¹ and his armor-bearer.² That was the motive which drove him and his colleagues into the Cave where they were, he assured the House, a most happy family daily increasing in number and strength, and whence they should go forth to deliver Israel from oppression. When he told the Liberals that many of them were going to vote for the Government against what they knew to be right, he provoked the retort³ that he was a noble Lord who after going along the benches with a lantern in search of what it seems he could not find, turned the full blaze of its light upon himself and there discovered his honest man.

Toward the close of the debates Mr. Lowe, loudly cheered by the Opposition, spoke with great effect against the conduct of the ministry, and against democracy.⁴ To him it seemed that the measure was calculated to destroy those institutions which had secured for England an amount of happiness and prosperity which no country had ever reached, or was ever likely to attain. On the following day, Disraeli declared that even if the noble Lord, the Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor), had not come forward to oppose the bill, somebody on the Conservative benches must have done so; for while they were perfectly willing to consider a complete measure of Reform, and had shown their readiness to do so, they must still oppose this measure on account of objections to the county franchise.⁵ Gladstone in a noteworthy speech delivered just before the division on the twenty-seventh of April declared that the point to be decided was whether the House would vote by a majority for the

¹ Gladstone.

² Bright.

³ By Mr. Coleridge, Hansard, vol. clxxxii, p. 1831.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 26), p. 2118.

⁵ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, pp. 94 et seq.

second reading of the bill—"that is to say, for a measure affirming the reduction of the franchise in the counties, and especially in towns."¹ In bidding for the support of the Opposition he warned them that by resisting great measures, as civil disabilities on account of religious belief, the first Reform Act, the repeal of the Corn Laws, they had given the power five out of every six years to the Liberals, and had reduced their influence in the country. When he sat down, the Speaker, writes a spectator,² put the question on the amendment in the dry technical form so puzzling to those unfamiliar with the proceedings. Strangers withdrew and members went to their respective lobbies. As the members returned to the seats on the floor or in the galleries great excitement began to manifest itself, and when finally the tellers walked up the floor, the House—says the writer—was charged as with electricity. Strangers in the galleries rose in their seats—Conservative M. P.'s sat upon the edges of benches—the Royal princes leaned forward in their inconvenient standing place and the officers of the House, participating in the universal excitement, had no eyes or ears for any breach of rule or order. Hardly had the ominous words, ayes to the right, 318, noes to the left, 313, been uttered than there arose a wild, raging shout from floor and gallery. Dozens of Tories hurrahed at the very top of their voices. Strangers in both galleries clapped their hands. The Adullamites cheered as loudly as any. And Lowe, the prince of the revolt, the instigator and prime mover of the conspiracy, stood up in the excitement of the movement—flushed, triumphant, and avenged. "'Who would have thought there was so much in Bob Lowe?' said one member to another; 'why, he was one of the cleverest men in Lord Palmerston's Government!'" "'All this comes of Lord Russell's sending for Goschen!' was the reply. 'Disraeli did not half so signally avenge himself against Peel' interposed another; 'Lowe has very nearly broken up the Liberal party.' There he stood, that usually cold, undemonstrative, intellectual, venerable-looking individual, shouting himself hoarse like the ringleader of school boys at a successful barring out! The Government had been saved from downright defeat by only five votes, but the bill was read a second time. As the members stepped out into New Palace Yard the twilight of that long-to-be-remembered night was brightening into day. Early as was the hour some three hundred persons were assembled to see them come out, and cheer the friends of the bill.

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 140.

² Vide Annals of our Time.

On the thirtieth of April the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed determination to go on with the bill.¹ The Government understood the situation to be this—one moiety of the House was prepared to accede to the proposal of the Government to enter upon the consideration of the franchise bill, upon the understanding that they would introduce a bill relating to the redistribution of seats and bills relating to the subject of Reform in Scotland and Ireland; the other moiety, that the House must have the whole intention of the Government with respect to Reform.

On the seventh of May Gladstone produced the bill for the redistribution of seats.² By this no constituency was disenfranchised, but some constituencies returning two members were deprived of one of them, and no less than forty-one small boroughs were grouped together according to their geographical relation in sixteen groups, returning one or two members each according to population. Of the forty-nine seats obtained by these arrangements it was proposed to distribute twenty-six among populous counties, to give a third member to Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and Leeds, and a second to Salford, to divide the Tower Hamlets into two divisions, with two members each, to create six new electoral boroughs with one member each and one with two, to give a seat to the University of London, and seven seats to Scotland. As to the boundaries, whatever enlargements should take place, the Parliamentary borough should follow the enlargement made for local purposes. Finally, the Government would not advise a prorogation of Parliament until the question of the franchise and redistribution had been disposed of. Leave was given to bring in the bill. The Times thought it simple in conception, practical in details and just in principles,¹ although so far as the parties were concerned, it would throw a certain amount of political weight to the Liberal side.² This, it said, would be the probable effect of the lower franchise in towns, still more of the lower franchise in counties, and of the transference of seats from small towns to large ones and populous counties. On the same day the Scotch and Irish Reform bills were also introduced.

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, pp. 163-166.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, pp. 486-507.

The second reading of the Redistribution bill was moved by Gladstone on the fourteenth of May. During the evening Disraeli attacked the manner in which it was proposed to deal with small boroughs as a scheme to disenfranchise the boroughs which had returned to the House representatives of the commercial, financial, colonial, and Indian interests. He advised the Government to withdraw the bill, prepare careful electoral statistics of the borough and county franchise, and in the next session give a good measure. Mr. Cardwell,³ on behalf of the Government, refused to accept this advice, claiming the object was to postpone Reform indefinitely. In reply to a question as to whether the Government would assent to having the bill referred to the same committee as that on the Representation of the People bill, with a view to the amalgamation of the two, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave assent to the proposal, and then the bill was read a second time.

¹ The Times, May 8, 1866, editorial.

² Opinion of the Times, May 9, 1866, editorial.

³ Secretary of State for the Colonies.

On the twenty-eighth of May the order for committee was read. After a motion for the fusion of the two bills had been agreed to, it was moved "That it be an instruction to the committee that they have power to make provision for the better prevention of bribery and corruption at elections." The Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to the motion, saying that the subject was one that amply merited separate discussion but could hardly be discussed to advantage in connection with a bill for the redistribution of seats or a bill relating to the franchise, and that additional information was needed.¹ Mr. Osborne² upheld the motion, declaring this a point which required reform even more than the franchise or the redistribution of seats. The Attorney General³ pointed out that this was not a proper time to consider the question and that the motion was a good one only as one means of throwing over all Reform in the present session. Mr. Bright also condemned the motion as really aimed at the destruction of the bill. Nevertheless it was carried against the Government by 248 as against 238 votes,—Disraeli and Lowe voting with the majority. The announcement was the occasion for great cheering on the part of the Opposition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the Speaker leave the chair, saying that the Government would give a dispassionate consideration to clauses on bribery but would hold to their purpose to go on with the bill. Captain Hayter,¹ moved that the redistribution scheme be considered an unsatisfactory measure.

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 1322.

² R. Bernal Osborne was an Independent Liberal.

³ Sir Roundell Palmer.

Thereupon the debate continued for four nights. In addition to many details upon redistribution, many of the arguments of the second reading were repeated.² Sir George Grey, Secretary of State for the Home Department, attacked the motion as one, which, if carried, would involve the whole bill,³ and as a "mode resorted to by the right honorable Gentleman to get rid of the bill altogether." To this speech Sir Hugh Cairns, a Conservative, replied that the Government did not answer criticisms and objections, and did not try to promote a free discussion of the question that the House was anxious to have sifted.⁴ He thought those out of doors would judge of the course which had been taken in this debate. Sir John Pakington⁵ wanted to have the question settled, but the Government—he thought—had rendered that impossible by having precipitately produced a vague and immature measure. During the course of the debates John Stuart Mill spoke for the representation of minorities⁶ and Mr. Lowe made use of a chance again to plead against trying anything like democracy:

To our hands at this moment is intrusted the noble and sacred future of free and self-determined Government all over the world. We are about to surrender certain good for more than doubtful change; we are about to barter maxims and traditions that have never failed, for theories and doctrines that have never succeeded. Democracy you may have at any

¹ Captain Hayter was elected as a Liberal in 1865.

² Cf. infra, pp. 160 et seq.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 1402.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 1403.

⁵ A Conservative.

⁶ Vide chapter v.

time. Night and day the gate is open that leads to that bare and level plain, where every ant's nest is a mountain and every thistle a forest tree. But a Government such as England has, a Government, the work of no human hand, but which has grown up the imperceptible aggregation of centuries—this is a thing which we only can enjoy, which we cannot impart to others, and which, once lost, we cannot recover for ourselves.¹

The Attorney General in reply declared Lowe's motto to be: "Move an inch from that point (the £10 franchise) and you are lost—you are on the high road to ruin;"² and, he added, "When he implores and entreats us to defer this bill for another year, I will tell my right honorable Friend the year to which he wishes us to defer the consideration of this subject—it is the millennium." Of course, many whose seats were to be taken away, spoke against the bill. On the other hand, Earl Grosvenor, now that the Redistribution bill had been brought in, supported the Government upon the ground that no resignation should be forced because of the state of affairs in Europe and because of the financial crisis.³ He said that some of the Opposition were prepared to compromise with the Government to get the measure through. Disraeli, however, declared the measure ill-advised and ill-prepared and hoped that the good sense of the House would allow the question to be adjourned until next session.⁴ Gladstone said that even if the grounds against the bill for the redistribution of seats were good grounds, they were totally insufficient to justify a vote against going into committee upon the bill.⁵ Captain Hayter by this time

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 1650.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 1651.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (June 4), pp. 1812-1813.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, pp. 1912-1913.

⁵ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (June 4), p. 1889.

"feeling certain that the measure would not be proceeded with in its present form in the present session" withdrew his amendment.

The House then went into committee, at which stage every clause was discussed in detail—and fought point by point with great earnestness and pertinacity on both sides.¹ Mr. Walpole, a Conservative, proposed a £20 instead of the £14 county occupation franchise. This change the Chancellor of the Exchequer strongly opposed and the amendment was beaten 297 to 283. During the debates on this amendment, Lord Stanley² proposed that the clause be postponed, hoping to have the redistribution settled before the franchise clauses, lest the ministry play the trick of dropping the Redistribution bill altogether. Bright denounced this action as another attempt to delay the bill and Gladstone congratulated the "honorable Gentlemen opposite upon their perfect mastery of the arts of ambush."³ On a division the motion was rejected.

The next controversy took place on the basis of value to be used in fixing the franchise. In place of the rental as the standard adopted by the Government, Mr. Hunt⁴ proposed,⁵ in respect to the county franchise, to change the standard by adding to the clause the words—"such clear yearly value being rateable value of the premises as ascertained for the purpose of the Poor Rate." Those for the amendment pointed out⁶ the advantage of making the rate book the register and the security against collusion; those against it, the fact that the rating varied in different places and was not a good test. The motion was rejected.

¹ Annual Register, 1866, p. 151.

² A Conservative.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 2068.

⁴ Mr. G. W. Hunt was a Conservative.

⁵ This was on June 11, 1867.

⁶ Cf. Annual Register, 1866, pp. 153-154.

But Lord Dunkellin,¹ on the eighteenth of June, moved an amendment referring to the borough franchise, similar to Mr. Hunt's motion. He proposed to leave out of the clause the words "clear yearly" in order to insert the word "rateable." It was argued on the one side that the rating was a convenient, inexpensive, and a constitutional mode of fixing the franchise,² that the rating test could be appealed against whereas the rental could not,³ that as the burden of local taxation was calculated on the rateable value, the advantage of the vote ought to be placed on the same basis;⁴ on the other, that even a £5 rating franchise would not admit so many as the present bill, that the rateable value was a test merely for local taxation which was borne by property, and had nothing to do with an occupation franchise, that inequalities in rateable value must always be greater than in the gross estimated rental, that many, as owners of mines, were not rated at all and would be disfranchised.⁵ According to Bright the object was to substitute £9 for £7; and many argued that the real object of the amendment was to get rid of the bill and the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared, "it is in my judgment an Amendment striking at the plan of enfranchisement proposed by the Government. So viewing it, I cannot enter into any engagement that we will accept an adverse vote, or regard it as otherwise than incompatible with the progress of the Bill."⁶ The question was put, that the words "clear yearly" stand. The result of the vote came—ayes 304;

¹ Lord Dunkellin had been elected in 1865 as a Liberal.

² Lord Dunkellin, Hansard, vol. clxxxiv, p. 540.

³ Mr. Henley, Hansard, vol. clxxxiv, p. 568.

⁴ Sir Hugh Cairns, Hansard, vol. clxxxiv, pp. 616 et seq.

⁵ Gladstone, Hansard, vol. clxxxiv, pp. 550 et seq.

⁶ Hansard, vol. clxxxiv, pp. 637-639.

noes 315; majority against the Government, eleven. Once again there was occasion for a great demonstration of joy by the Adullamites and the Conservatives; the defeat of the Government produced a frantic enthusiasm unequalled by any of the frequent divisions of the session.¹

The bill had failed to pass. A part of the Liberals plus the Conservatives had defeated a measure not itself so liberal but regarded by popular opinion as an advance in the right direction. Thus Parliament stood in June, 1866, opposed to Reform, not that all who voted against the bill professed an aversion to Reform, but it could not escape notice that many of the most telling speeches were against any democratic tendencies.

Among the many arguments used against the bill the following summary presents a number of the most important. In the first place there were the arguments against the bill itself. It was said that the bill was not wanted—that if there had been any great necessity for it or any desire for it on the part of the country, instead of the question being before the country for fourteen years there would not have been fourteen months of agitation upon it.² The question of Reform had been agitated under the most favorable circumstances from 1852 to 1865.

It had been taken up by every Administration, and supported and recommended by every prominent public man. It has had three-fourths of the press as the partisans of one side or the other writing in its favor. It had public meetings innumerable, and an active agitation founded on the undisputed fact of 5,000,000 of unenfranchised operatives. Yet these cabinets were all defeated, the ministers more or less discredited, the bills all rejected; the agitation a failure: and the more the question was stirred, the more vividly apparent it became that the projected changes were not suited to the wants and temper of the times, and that the country—watching, listening, reading, and judging—was brought slowly, but surely to the conviction that these changes were not founded in reason, that they were opposed to justice, that they were fatal to the growth of liberty—that they were the creed of a small and noisy section of politicians of extreme opinions, who had gained an accidental and mischievous importance from the fact that the two great political parties in the State were so evenly balanced that rival chiefs vied with one another in bidding for the support of that extreme minority; but that the general thought and education of the country—the morality, the statesmanship, the patriotism of every class, from the highest to the lowest—clung with instinctive fervor to the institutions which they saw approached with an unfriendly hand, and with one will and one voice forbade that that old tree of English liberty which had been the slow growth of ages and the admiration of nations should be transformed into the brazen image of ignorance and intolerance which the worshippers of Trans-Atlantic equality wanted to set up.¹

¹ Vide Annals of Our Time and the Annual Register.

² Lord Elcho (an Adullamite), vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1664.

It was said that the old £10 formed a line giving a precedent and a principle. "It afforded a precedent, because it formed part of a great historical settlement which had worked well and done admirable service for thirty-five years. It constituted a principle, and one recognized throughout the whole of our English Constitution, that the franchise was a trust and not a right."²

Besides, the electoral statistics upon which the bill was based, were not satisfactory, said Viscount Cranborne.³ It should be known who the new masters were to be, before the House of Commons was asked to transfer the power over the legislation, the taxation, and the finances of the country from that section of the community holding it to another section. The question of the number to be enfranchised should be carefully studied especially since a great increase in that number would result from having the £5 and £6 houses changed to houses to be rented at £7.¹ Another defect of the bill was that it would suppress the agricultural interests, especially by permitting the city voters not within the limits of the represented boroughs and those from the numerous towns which were unrepresented to inundate the county constituencies with urban and trading votes of £14 rental.²

¹ Mr. Horsman (Adullamite), Hansard, vol. clxxxii, pp. 98-99.

² Mr. Laing (Adullamite), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), p. 81.

³ Conservative, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 23), p. 876.

The bill was going to enfranchise under a new name one class of men who had been disfranchised heretofore—the “freemen”—a class in which Mr. Lowe and the Adullamites had no confidence.³ One member⁴ opposed the bill as a scheme on the part of the North of England which had grown important by the rise of the great manufacturing towns, to get more power in the body politic than it had hitherto possessed.

One of the chief sources of opposition was due to the fact that it was only a franchise bill. And when this defect was remedied,⁵ the additional provisions were denounced as lacking that care, deliberation, and foresight which ought to have been exercised by the Government.⁶ The principle

¹ Lord Elcho, quoting from letter, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 23), p. 863.

² Mr. Adderley (Conservative), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16), p. 1414.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 148.

⁴ Cf. Mr. Beresford Hope (Independent Conservative), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1695.

⁵ Cf. supra, p. 153.

⁶ Sir John Pakington (Conservative), Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 1573.

of equal electoral districts, or an approximation to such districts, was attacked as the wrong principle upon which a redistribution bill ought to be based,¹ and the anomalies created by the bill were declared to be worse than those existing.² The granting of three members to counties³ was to Lowe the mere worship of numbers.⁴ As it seemed to him, every member had two separate and distinct duties to perform. He was the representative of the borough which sent him to Parliament, and he had to look after its local interests to the best of his power. That was a small and, in the mild and just times in which he was living, generally a comparatively easy duty, but his greater and more pre-eminent duty was to look after the affairs of the Empire. Sir Hugh Cairns objected to the grouping, saying that there was no harmony in the boroughs put together, that bribery would go on in the grouped boroughs because the telegraph had done away with the advantage of having polling places twenty or thirty miles apart, that large constituencies were expensive because elections were sure to be contested, that Scotland had no claim to more members inasmuch as its population, wealth, and interests were not increasing in proportion to England's, and that the bill should have given special attention to boundaries.⁵

Finally, a motive for opposing the bill—a motive which may have influenced a number of the Adullamites—was well expressed by Lord Elcho. He dreaded the bill not only on account of the provisions which it contained, but because it met “with support from persons who have hitherto been

¹ Mr. Lowe, Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 1627.

² Ibid., p. 1635.

³ As was done to some extent by the Redistribution of Seats bill.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii, p. 1639.

⁵ A Conservative, Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (June 1), pp. 1698 et seq.

in favor of the very widest possible extension of the franchise." ¹

In addition to the arguments against the bill itself there were arguments against the present Government dealing with the question of Reform. Mr. Horsman suggested that the Government was not strong enough to deal with it.² It was said that Reform was again brought up to excite popular feeling on behalf of a weak Government.³ The faults of the bill were attributed to the fact that it had been drawn not so much with regard to the wants and requirements of the case as to satisfy the requirements of particular constituencies and to ensure the support of certain politicians.⁴

But arguments of far greater interest than these given, are the ones against any Reform. Sometimes they took the shape of a denial of the need for Reform, sometimes they were a portrayal of democracy and the evils thereof, sometimes an appeal to patriotism—a plea that the Constitution, of glorious origin and history, of happy influence upon a great nation, be not ruined by the acceptance of the American doctrine of representation according to numbers.

As to the first of these arguments—it was said that there was nothing to be done by a reformed or a new Parliament. Mr. Laing declared that

Previous to 1832 the Conservative element so far preponderated that the country was brought into great danger; it was impossible to effect salutary changes in time, and, consequently, matters were brought to a point where a choice had

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1672.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), p. 100.

³ Cf. Viscount Royston (Conservative), vol. clxxxii, p. 2130, and Horsman, vol. clxxxii, p. 92.

⁴ Mr. Doulton (Conservative), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1711.

to be made between the alternative of Reform or revolution. But since the Reform Act of 1832, could any one fairly and justly say that the Conservative element had unduly preponderated in the political representation of this country? Had not abuse after abuse been reformed until at last we had no practical abuses left? ("Oh.") He repeated that deliberately. Improvement had been carried to such an extent that it was no longer possible for the public opinion of the country to declare, "There is something which ought to be done, and the Parliament of the country will not do it." There were no longer any great questions upon which the opinion of the country was not in entire accordance with the opinions represented in the House. The existing system worked admirably, yet Parliament was asked to re-open most exciting questions.¹

It was affirmed that the object of government is to construct the best machinery for the purpose to which it is to be applied, and that the present government was the best possible!²

Reform was not needed because it was no more necessary for workingmen to be represented by workingmen than it was necessary for clergymen to be represented by clergymen.³ Besides, how could the real workingman who lived by his own labor sit in Parliament unless provided with the means to do so? The middle class, "which goes upwards into the highest extreme of society, and penetrates into the lowest, was the class of all others that could exercise the best influence on the policy and the government of the country."⁴

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), pp. 79-80; cf., also, Mr. Lowe, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 161, and Mr. Meller (Conservative), ibid., p. 187.

² Cf. Mr. Adderley, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16), p. 1421, and Mr. Lowe, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 154.

³ Mr. Gathorne Hardy (Conservative), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1741.

⁴ Mr. Gregory (Adullamite), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 20), p. 1795.

Change in the electoral laws was unnecessary because higher rents and higher wages—due to the discovery of gold in California and Australia, emigration, the vast extension in trade and commerce, the increasing demand for labor—had caused enfranchisement by a gradual process.¹ And the proportion of the working classes now, instead of being so insignificant as had been supposed, amounted to 26 per cent of the whole number of the borough electors; so far from being rigid and inelastic that number was steadily and rapidly rising.² If one excluded from one's calculations on the increase of the number of workingmen enjoying the franchise since 1833 the scot and lot voters, who were dying out, that increase would be seen to be almost double the number usually given. Finally Mr. Lowe told the House that if the working class had only 128,000 in the present constituencies, it was very much their own fault, because many more of them had the means if they chose to live in £10 houses.

Furthermore the working class should not be represented in proportion to numbers, because according to the principle of the Constitution, Parliament was a mirror—a representation of every class—not according to heads, not according to numbers, but according to everything which gives weight and importance in the world without, so that the various classes of the country might be heard, and their views expressed fairly in the House of Commons without the possibility of any one class outnumbering and reducing to silence all the other classes in the kingdom.³ If you corrected the anomaly by which numbers were excluded from the Constitution, you had to correct also the anomaly by which wealth was excluded.⁴

¹ Mr. Lowe, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), pp. 146 and 147.

² Mr. Laing, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), pp. 76 and 77.

³ Sir Hugh Cairns, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16), p. 1463.

⁴ Viscount Cranborne, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), pp. 230-231.

Again, it was said that those who really desired Reform were those who wished to bring the country to the lowest level of democracy;¹ that the proposition for the extension of the franchise was simply a rule of thumb change, a lowering without modification or check. It was placing the franchise on an incline, where once placed, it had an inevitable tendency to reach the bottom.² The same necessity now alleged to justify the lowering of the franchise from £10 to £7 would under the same pressure take it down from £7 to £4 or even to 4s.³ As to the argument that the urban working class had been admitted to a fourth share of the suffrage without danger, that they had been admitted without Parliament's realizing the fact, and that, therefore, there could be no danger in giving them a half share upon a principle which must soon give them a preponderant majority—such an argument reminded Sir E. Bulwer-Lytton of the Irishman's bull: "If one quince can give so good a flavor to an apple pie, how wonderfully good must be an apple pie that is all quinces."⁴ Democracy seemed to him to be essentially the government that belonged to societies in their youth when the habits of men, even more than their laws, produced a certain equality of manners and education.⁵ Said he:

If there be a country in the world in which democracy would be a ruinous experiment, it is surely a country like England, with a very limited area of soil compared to the pressure of

¹ Mr. Marsh (Adullamite), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), pp. 61-62.

² Mr. G. Hardy, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1746.

³ Mr. Horsman, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 20), p. 1844.

⁴ Sir E. Bulwer-Lytton (a Conservative by this time although he had stood for the Reform bill of 1832), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1243.

⁵ Ibid., p. 1244.

its population, with a commerce so based upon credit and national prestige, that it would perish for ever if by any neglect of democratic economy, or, what is more probable, any adventure of democratic rashness, our naval power were destroyed; and with differences of religious sects so serious that we should find it impossible to precede democracy by that universal and generous system of education without which it would be madness to make the working class the sovereign constituency of a Legislative Assembly.

Mr. Lowe had learned at Oxford that democracy was a form of government in which the poor, being very many, governed the whole country, including the rich, who were few, and for the benefit of the poor, and he feared a government of the rich by the poor.¹

Moreover, many other evils resulting from democracy were depicted. Bribery would be greatly increased.² To those who said that enlarging the number of voters would tend to do away with bribery, Mr. Lowe gave answer that such a remedy was like turning one hundred sound cattle among half a dozen diseased ones with the hope of doing good to the latter. The sound ones were very apt to be infected, he thought.³ Again, adding a large number of persons to the constituencies would increase the expenses of candidates, and it would enormously increase the expenses of the management of elections, even supposing that everything was conducted in a legitimate and fair manner.⁴ It would weaken the executive, "because the moment you have universal suffrage it always happens that the man who

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 26), p. 2095.

² Mr. Gregory, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 20), p. 1792.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 26), p. 2107.

⁴ Mr. Lowe, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), pp. 148-149; Mr. Laing, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), p. 83.

elects despises the elected.”¹ It compelled a limitation to the powers and authority of the representative chamber as was shown in America and France where the popular chamber had not the same voice in foreign affairs and in peace and war.² Democracies were for war and against free trade.³

Mr. Lowe was not the only member of Parliament who could not trust the working classes. Others⁴ there were, who could not place implicit trust in the workingman in boroughs and for this reason: he was always engaged in strikes and would be the cause of sending capital and business to foreign countries; and he would believe almost everything told him by his leaders. As to the representatives of the workingmen,—one could see in America, where the people had undisputed power, that they did not send honest, hard-working men to represent them in Congress, but traffickers in office, bankrupts, men who had lost their character and had been driven from every respectable way of life, and who had taken up politics as a last resort.⁵ And as to their laws—

Under the democratic institutions of America they had such legislation as the Maine Liquor Law:⁶ and in this country,

¹ Disraeli, Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (April 27), p. 93.

² Bulwer-Lytton, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), pp. 1248-9.

³ Lowe, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 26), p. 2105.

⁴ Cf., for instance, the words of Mr. Banks Stanhope (Conservative) in Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 12), p. 1217.

⁵ An observation which Mr. Lowe made, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 26), p. 2107.

⁶ The first state prohibitory law in Maine was passed in 1851, and, since its enactment, has been amended somewhat during almost every session. Under this “Maine law” the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, except the sale for medicinal purposes, etc., were prohibited, but the enforcement of the law devolved upon the county attorney and the sheriff and his deputies. For medical purposes, an where trades unions legislated for their fellow-workmen, the result was that the houses and workshops of those who did not assent to the legislation of those unions were blown up by gunpowder. In Australia the influence of trades unions was more extensive than here; there they operated on Parliament with a view to give their measures the force of law, and a deputation from trades unions had urged on the government there the propriety of introducing an eight hours labor bill.¹

The franchise should not be indiscriminately lowered, but rather given to the working classes as a reward for good conduct and provident habits. It was evident² that the present working-class ten-pound householders were superior men of their class. But if the franchise were indiscriminately lowered there would be admitted to the privilege of voting those of not so high a character and those who had not been so provident and careful to lodge their families in comfortable houses. The franchise was not given as a right but as a trust for the benefit of the country, and in the selection of the trustees, they must consider who were the best qualified to hold it.³ The moral aspect of the question must be considered.

agency, authorized by municipal officers, was established. Opponents of the law have claimed it has been either a dead letter or a license rather than a prohibitory law, and that widespread corruption has come from its pretended enforcement. They became so strong in numbers that in 1911 prohibition was saved by only a few hundred votes, and even as late as 1914-1916 the enforcement of the law was very lax. In 1917, however, the legislature gave the executive the machinery for absolute enforcement and the law can no longer be called a "dead letter." Vide William MacDonald, The Government of Maine (London, 1902), pp. 159-161, and for the most recent account (by a partisan of prohibition) and a bibliography, Ernest Gordon, The Maine Law (New York, 1919).

¹ Mr. Marsh, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), p. 62.

² Mr. Laing, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), p. 83.

³ Mr. Horsfall (Conservative), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 12), p. 1186.

Enfranchising a number of the workingmen would not be enfranchising that great number of minds all independently turned upon the same questions from different points of view, which the widening of the franchise would be in other portions of the social polity. It would be merely performing a multiplication sum, and developing the same single instincts, single prejudices, single desires, and single opinions influenced by one newspaper and one set of ideas. There might be expected, therefore, further claims as soon as this bill was passed.¹ And when once the workingmen have found themselves in a full majority of the whole constituency, they will awake to a full sense of their power. They will say, "we can do better for ourselves. Do not let us any longer be cajoled at elections. Let us set up shop for ourselves. We have objects to serve as well as our neighbors, and let us unite to carry those objects. We have machinery; we have our trades unions; we have our leaders all ready. We have the power of combination, as we have shown over and over again; and when we have a prize to fight for we will bring it to bear with tenfold more force than ever before."²

They might be expected most warmly to support those extreme Reformers who wished to substitute direct taxation for all indirect taxation and would then become perfectly indifferent to the amount of the public expenditure.³ They might be expected to have great influence in those questions between labor and capital, between manufacturer and mechanic, between supply and demand, upon which the very existence of this commercial England depended.⁴

¹ Mr. Beresford Hope, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1688, and vide, also, Viscount Cranborne, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 234, and Sir Hugh Cairns, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16), p. 1474.

² Lowe, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), pp. 148-149.

³ Gen. Peel (Conservative), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 12), p. 1207.

⁴ Bulwer-Lytton, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1248.

But should the bill pass, by what special course of legislation¹ was the poor man's daughter to be enabled to view the face of nature as a consequence of Parliamentary Reform?² As for the rate of wages—that depended on “the inflexible laws of supply and demand.” It was not the duty of the Legislature to house and feed the people, or to look after such things as adulterated food or industrial diseases.³ The working classes could not succeed in the attainment of these objects which were so much in violation of the truths of political economy, but the attempt to do so might be more disastrous than the success of the measures themselves. The very fact that the men whom they trusted as their speakers and delegates at political meetings urged such subjects on the notice of their hearers, ought to be sufficient to warn of the danger of entering the course which proposed to give the working classes entire and undisputed control over the policy of Parliament.

In addition to the arguments given, were those characterized by vagueness but nevertheless often effective upon an audience: “We are opposed to a measure of this nature, which unsettles everything and settles nothing.”⁴ Then, too, one must not forget the influence of oratory. What now seems at times to be a platitude, was of great effectiveness, as the editorials of the newspapers bear witness, when uttered by a Robert Lowe, a John Bright, or a Gladstone.

Refutations, of course, played an important part in the debates. In reply to Gladstone's plea that those to be en-

¹ Cf. supra, pp. 98-99, a reply to Mr. Odger's speech; note also the amount of harm which a reformed House might do, although no good could be expected of it.

² Cranborne, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 233.

³ Vide speech of Mr. Gregory, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 20), pp. 1794-1795.

⁴ Mr. Whiteside (Conservative), Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 192.

franchised should not be treated as an invading army but as their own flesh and blood and fellow Christians, it was suggested ¹ that Gladstone, according to the bill, looked upon the £7 voters as real flesh and blood but those below as only gradual flesh and blood, and that if this fellow-Christian theory were pushed to the utmost, should not the five millions of adult women in the country be considered? ²

Gladstone's arguments that the working classes deserved more representation because of their share of taxation was retorted to in several ways. Even admitting the taxation of the working classes to be three-sevenths, said one, ³ by far the greater portion of that was paid on articles of spirits, beer, and tobacco. Certainly it was most extraordinary in estimating the fitness of persons for the franchise, to maintain that a class is entitled to a larger share in the representation in exact proportion to the larger quantity of beer and spirits which its members consume. Another ⁴ saw a fallacy in the income argument because the income of the workingmen was payment for their labor from the capital of others; another, ⁵ because the figures on the income referred to all members of the working class, whereas the bill would not admit all.

Against the speeches of Bright to the effect that something should be done in time before the working classes became excited, the opponents talked about yielding to intimidation. ⁶

As for fulfilling the pledges—a subject of so much dis-

¹ Bulwer-Lytton, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1246.

² Mr. Banks Stanhope, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 12), p. 1217.

³ Mr. Laing, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1320.

⁴ Mr. Banks Stanhope, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 12), p. 1217.

⁵ Lowe, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 26), pp. 2092-2093.

⁶ Vide, for instance, Bulwer-Lytton, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1244.

cussion — Disraeli said that no Parliament could be bound by the acts of its predecessors, except so far as they had taken the forms of law; and such forms Parliament had the power to revise.¹

The Liberals being the authors of the bill, found themselves quite often on the defensive. Among their speeches are to be found replies to most of the important arguments of the Adullamites and the Conservatives. For instance, in defense of the bill, they declared that there was agitation for Reform but it was of a peaceful and orderly character; ² that what excitement there was on the bill, was for it; ³ that a feeling prevailed, universally throughout the country, that the whole number of electors was much too small to afford a satisfactory representation of the people, and that the largest class in the country, that class which, most of all, made the nation, was specially excluded.⁴ It was predicted that there might not always be the same political calm in the country as was now happily prevailing; and that if any great disasters should happen to the people, and in the midst of their misery they should also be goaded by a sense of wrong, they would not appeal to the House in a calm and moderate tone.⁵ Besides it had often been alleged against the settlement of other great questions that the change was not required because not demanded; the Opposition maintaining that the people did not want Reform, because they were so quiet and orderly, led one to the conclusion from this kind of argument that if the people did desire it, they would have to resort to other than constitutional means to obtain

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (April 27), p. 75.

² Captain Grosvenor, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), p. 88.

³ The Attorney General, Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (May 31), p. 1659.

⁴ Mr. Bright, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 23), p. 1883.

⁵ Mr. Maguire, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16), p. 1374, and Mr. Baines, Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (April 27), p. 59.

it.¹ Also it was said that citizenship together with its accompanying privileges was an inducement for laborers to go to the colonies, so that England was losing strong and skillful arms.² As to the virtue of the sacred £10 line,—£7 was held to be as safe a point now as £10 was in 1832.³ According to the great progress in education, in prudential habits, as shown by the savings banks' returns, and in various other respects, which had been made by the working class, the bill of 1832 was not fitted for 1866.⁴

Inasmuch as there were found in the constituencies at the present moment a large number of workingmen whom honorable members opposite did not suspect to be there, Mr. Goschen thought minutely exact electoral statistics not so important;⁵ Gladstone complained that the Opposition in dealing with the statistics acted as if they were engaged in ascertaining the numbers of an invading army.⁶ In reply to the cry that the bill was suppressing the agricultural interests,—where, it was asked,⁷ would the landowners be if influence in elections were merely proportionate to numbers!

The bill, of course, was only a franchise bill, but it was declared to be distinct, clear, without any tricks—without semblance of giving something in one clause, and then withdrawing that something in the clause that followed.⁸ The Reform question had been one of franchise more than redis-

¹ Mr. Villiers, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), pp. 176-177.

² Mr. Fawcett, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 208.

³ Mr. Young, Solicitor General for Scotland, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 20), p. 1809.

⁴ Sir Francis Crossley, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), p. 70.

⁵ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 23), p. 878.

⁶ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 23), p. 873.

⁷ Sir Francis Goldsmid, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1278.

⁸ Mr. Bright, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 209.

tribution all along.¹ The extension of the franchise affected a particular portion of the population; the redistribution of seats did not; it affected all. Derby's Government in 1859 had regarded the question of the franchise as the more important.² Gladstone pointed out that of the one hundred and seventeen borough members who entered into particulars on the subject of Reform before their constituents, no more than sixteen referred to the redistribution of seats, and of those sixteen all were willing to vote for the bill.³ The Redistribution bill, when added, Gladstone defended as not creating a single anomaly but only reproducing a much milder form of the old anomalies.⁴ He defended the grouping by pointing out that the system worked well in Wales, and in general answered the objections of the Opposition.⁵ The Radicals supported the measure not because it was adequate but because it was good to some extent and because they preferred such a bill to force.⁶

In defense of the Government the point was made that it was far better situated to pass the bill than the coalition was to defeat it, since such a combination of Conservatives and moderate Liberals would fall to pieces at the moment of victory.⁷

The arguments set forth by the opponents of the bill, which may be classed as arguments against any further Reform acts, were often well met. It was shown that many of the same arguments used against this bill were used

¹ Mr. Bright, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 23), pp. 1879-1880.

² Mr. Bright, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 23), p. 1887.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (April 27), p. 133.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (June 4), pp. 1879 et seq.

⁵ Cf. long speech on June 4.

⁶ Mr. Bright, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), pp. 222-223 and elsewhere.

⁷ Mr. Childers, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 26), p. 2171.

against the bill of 1832 which now was so reverently upheld.¹ Even if, according to the electoral statistics, the working class now had 25 per cent of the votes, they did not have 25 per cent of the representation to the House.² Reform was needed because there were abuses to be done away with: a larger representation of the working class would have a happy effect in bringing about an early settlement of some important questions affecting capital and labor.³ The working classes indeed had many grievances of which they had a right to complain.⁴ While they were laboring for themselves, and working out their own ideas, how had the Legislature helped them? For instance, had it housed, fed, or educated them? There was the question of arbitration courts, as connected with the labor problem, which had been handed backwards and forwards, sometimes in one House and sometimes in another. Then there was the question of the Master and Workmen's Acts; the question of the workhouse infirmaries; the question of dangerous and unwholesome trades. Would any one who looked at this subject fairly and dispassionately say that if the class upon whom these interests pressed—who worked in these workshops and lived in these hovels—had been fairly represented, their condition would not have been improved? As an instance of the want of sympathy on the part of the House with the working class, there might be mentioned the existing laws regulating the sale of alcoholic drinks; for though a very large majority of the working class complained of them as throwing temptations to insobriety in their way, the only answer they got from Parliament was that they ought to

¹ Ibid., pp. 2168 et seq.

² Mr. Goschen, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 23), p. 1967.

³ Mr. Baxter, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1237.

⁴ Mr. Thomas Hughes, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), pp. 1707 et seq.

have resolution enough to resist those temptations. Another¹ asked, if there were no practical abuses in the year of grace, 1866, would Ireland be in her present condition? Would there be a rampant church in this country? Would the old land question remain unsettled? Would the enormous and profligate expenditure still be going on to the same extent as was declaimed against in 1859 by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he said he could not answer for the consequences if such an enormous outlay were continued? The best thing that could happen in this country would be a healthy admixture of the artisan class among the members of this House. Concerning the argument that the present government was the best possible and that the electoral system was all that could be desired, Mr. Baines pointed out that in 1830 the Duke of Wellington affirmed that no conceivable form of representation could excel in excellence and adaptation to its ends the then existing system, that the Reform Act of 1832 was declared by the Conservative party in Parliament to be nothing less than a revolution calculated to subject the intelligence and education of the country to the ascendancy of the uneducated classes and the mobocracy of the country.² Many practical grievances which existed before 1832 had been removed in consequence of that very infusion into the House of the popular element which Conservative members declared at the time to be a revolution. He believed that there were good grounds for expecting a further measure in the same direction to be attended with the like beneficial effects.—Moreover, in a case of great emergency, it would not be well to have large sections of the people feel that they had no sphere in the government of the country.³

¹ Mr. Osborne, Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (June 9), p. 1819.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), pp. 84-85.

³ Mr. Villiers, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), pp. 175 and 176.

Indeed, Reform was needed in order to allow the workingman to be represented by members of his social class. What, it was asked, do ¹ members of the House know about the workingman's view of trade unions, strikes, and apprenticeships? Every man and every class has erroneous opinions to be checked up only by contact with others. The questions, which are likely each year to assume a greater importance in this House, are questions affecting capital and labor, and many gentlemen who now consider themselves the representatives of the working class are notably capitalists, and on such questions are more likely to sympathize with their order than with labor.² John Bright, for instance, had always been opposed to the operatives on the question of factory legislation. While much was said of the danger and impropriety of giving the working classes a predominance in Parliament, it was the complaint of one member that he had heard nothing of the impropriety of the opposite course—the predominance of the middle classes—“indeed the working classes being in a minority seems to be accepted as of perfectly unquestionable right.”³ Another ⁴ complained:

I find that 217 of this House's Members are either directly connected with or are actual members of the aristocracy. Talk of trade unions! Why, is not this House a trades union to a certain extent? (Mr. Bright: “Hear, Hear!”) Have we not 217 members who constitute to all intents and purposes a trades union? But it is said, do they all give their votes on one side? No; like the Trade unions, they differ in their political sentiments. I find, on referring to Mr. Sandford's History of Great Families, that there are no less than 1,500

¹ J. S. Mill, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), pp. 1259-1260.

² Mr. Fawcett, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 206.

³ Mr. Graham, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1653.

⁴ Mr. Osborne, Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (June 4), pp. 1818-1819.

members of great families who constitute the whole of the Upper Chamber, and one-third of this House, and yet we hear honorable Gentlemen talk of the necessity of keeping out the artizan class.

It was denied that the enfranchisement of the working classes was actually in course of being effected by a natural process.¹ No proof was to be found for the statement that there was a rapid growth of the working classes among the ten-pound householders. When the first register was made up after 1832, it was found that the proportion of electors to male adults in England and Wales was one in five—that one out of every five male adults had a vote—and that proportion was still continuing in 1865.² Only a small portion of the working class could hope to receive income enough to reach the ten-pound line.³ And, although many artisans had risen to wealth and eminence from the humblest walks of life and were deserving of much credit, they were not representative men of their class.⁴

The Constitution would not be endangered by gradual changes made in time or wise concessions gracefully given but by a policy of determined resistance to all changes, and the persistent refusal to grant reasonable popular demands.⁵ Gladstone thought the noble Constitution of England had struck deep roots in the soil and was fixed there in a manner to defy the harmful effects of such a slight change as would result from a £3 reduction in the franchise qualifications.⁶

¹ Gladstone, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 12), p. 1142.

² Mr. Milner Gibson, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1726.

³ Gladstone, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 12), p. 54.

⁴ Mr. Thomas Hughes, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1706.

⁵ Mr. Baxter, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1230.

⁶ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (April 27), p. 123.

Of those who alleged to see in the bill an inevitable tendency towards democracy on the ground that the franchise was being placed on an incline, Bright asked:

Did any honorable Gentleman sitting in this House ever vote upon any measure of arrangement and organization like this one, and could confidently assure himself that the measure would be final? He must have a very poor notion of what our children will be if he thinks them less competent to decide such questions for themselves than we are at present to decide them.¹

And, though this bill gave nothing like democracy, what were the great evils which were supposed to come with any tendency in that direction? Large masses could not be so easily bribed as a few people.² Besides, said Mr. Layard,³ "You have no right to throw it in the teeth of the workingmen that they are unfit to exercise the franchise because they are corrupt, whilst you (i. e., Members of the House) are their corruptors. (Great confusion and interruptions from the Opposition.)" The workingmen would not be anxious for war, for with their property they had interest in taxes.⁴ Look at the colonies where they had the right of voting.⁵ The financial condition was good; there was a liberal provision for public worship; the votes for public education would shame this House; they tended to their own defense; and their protectionist members were returned largely by the agricultural constituencies, not by the working class. In Australia, said Mr. Fawcett, property is as secure, law is as justly administered, as here;

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 213.

² Mr. Baxter, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1236.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16), p. 1449.

⁴ Mr. Layard, Hansard, vol. clxxxii, p. 1447.

⁵ Mr. Childers, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 26), pp. 2158-9.

“and they at least have not, as we have, a burden of destitution constantly reminding our statesmen that they have left their highest mission unfulfilled, and that is to wage successful war against pauperism.”¹ Mr. Goschen thought it of little use to argue from conditions in the colonies and America inasmuch as there was a difference in the relative position of labor and capital in those countries as compared with England.² No constituencies in England, however, in which the working class had the decided influence now were returning demagogues as their representatives.³

To assume that the working class would vote en masse was no more right than to assume that the middle class or the upper class would do so.⁴ Workingmen followed their own opinions,⁵ not those of their leaders as could be seen from their disagreement with Cobden on the subject of the Russian war. No political union could be arranged between the miners of Cornwall, the masons of London, and the mill hands of the North, unless a real bond of union should be given by keeping them, as wage receivers, from the franchise. And if excluded too long they might at last be induced to make their trade unions a political engine. But if this bill passed it would be final for their political lives, because it was not easy to get up a political agitation. The workingmen did not find it easy to leave work and lose wages for the purpose of attending political meetings.

The Liberals had, of course, a good argument when they mentioned the advance in general intelligence of the work-

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), p. 204.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 23), p. 1966.

³ Mr. Layard, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16), p. 1449.

⁴ Mr. Fawcett, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (March 13), pp. 205-6.

⁵ W. E. Forster, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 16), pp. 1391-3.

ing class since 1832. Mr. Baines, a member in whose statistics the House had a degree of confidence, stated that in 1865 there were 3,100,000 scholars in day schools compared with 1,250,000 in 1832. In 1831 the number of copies of newspapers circulating in England was 38,000,000; in 1864 the number had increased to 546,000,000. The circulation of the magazines and serials, weekly and monthly, literary, scientific, religious, and moral, had increased in the same time from 400,000 copies a month to 6,000,000 a month—an increase for which the working class was in no small degree responsible.¹ They were able to carry on successfully such organizations as the Amalgamated Society of Engineers;² they were successful with their co-operative societies;³ they were interested in libraries.⁴ Besides they had shown a most commendable patience and fortitude in Lancashire during the cotton famine which was the theme for much praise. As a class, too, the workmen needed representation. John Stuart Mill championed them:

While so many classes, comparatively insignificant in numbers, and not supposed to be freer from class partialities or interests than their neighbors, are represented, some of them, I venture to say, greatly over-represented in this House, there is a class, more numerous than all the others, and therefore, as a mere matter of human feeling, entitled to more consideration—weak as yet, and therefore, needing representation the more, but daily becoming stronger, and more capable of making its claims good—and this class is not represented. We claim, then, a large and liberal representation of the working classes, on the conservative theory of the Constitution.

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxiii (April 27), pp. 57-58.

² Vide Mr. Thomas Hughes, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 19), p. 1705.

³ Vide Mr. Baxter, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), p. 1235.

⁴ Vide Gladstone, Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 12), p. 1132.

We demand that they be represented as a class, if represented they cannot be as human beings.¹

In conclusion it may be stated that the belief of the working class that the majority of the members of the House of Commons stood against Reform was not without foundation. Arguments against any extension of the suffrage had been boldly spoken; the Conservatives and Adullamites had tried to have the bill put off, had tried to cast it aside through various amendments, had tried to make it even less liberal than it was, and had finally defeated it. One can argue that the Conservatives may have been more opposed to the bill and its authors than to Reform itself; but certain it is that the bill of 1866 contained more promising material from which could have been constructed a good bill than the platitudes put forth by Disraeli in the following session, which were changed by a House under pressure into one of the most important measures of the century. And if the Conservatives as a party were anxious to grant electoral Reform their past history gave no evidence of the desire. At least the working class expressed itself more than once in 1866 as seeing in the men of the Conservative and Adullamite faith—men elected to represent England—strong opponents to Reform.

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxii (April 13), pp. 1255-1256.

CHAPTER V

DISRAELI'S SUCCESS WITH REFORM IN 1867

THE Adullamites and the Conservatives had given the Liberal Government an adverse vote in passing Lord Dunkellin's amendment to the Reform bill for the rateable value instead of the gross estimated rental as the basis of the franchise. Resignation was the natural method of procedure for Gladstone and his colleagues. They might have demanded dissolution but Mr. Brand, the whip, thought that such a course would be unpopular with the Liberals on account of election expenses.¹ Moreover, an appeal to the country on the Reform question would have had the effect of breaking up the party by causing the Palmerstonian Liberals to go to the Opposition at a time when the country itself was more or less apathetic. They might have gone on with the bill, trusting to reverse the vote on report or they might have taken shelter under a general vote of confidence. However, at a cabinet meeting on June 25, 1866, resignation was agreed upon. Gladstone himself was glad to have the matter near its close.² The Queen, when informed of her ministers' intentions expressed opposition to change because of the critical situation on the Continent.³ But Russell and Gladstone after an interview with Her Majesty and a consultation with Brand and the cabinet decided finally (June 26) on resignation. "At six," writes

¹ Cf. Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, pp. 207 et seq.

² Ibid., p. 209.

³ The Seven Weeks' War had broken out on June 18.

Gladstone, "I went down and made my explanation for the government. I kept to facts without epithets, but I thought as I went on that some of the words were scorching. A crowd and great enthusiasm in Palace Yard on departure."

Although Gladstone's speech on this occasion may not strike a reader of to-day as being especially "scorching" under the circumstances, he cannot help noticing that it is a clear and definite statement of the attitude taken by the Government on the situation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer showed that Dunkellin's motion was absolutely unacceptable because there was no form or figure of enfranchisement founded on mere relation to rateable value which would express faithfully and exactly the scale of enfranchisement best suited, in the Government's opinion, to the public interest. In 16 boroughs the adoption of a franchise founded on a rateable value of above £6 would enfranchise a number at least equal to the number the bill proposed to enfranchise. But in 39 boroughs a rateable value of £6, in 112 boroughs a rateable value of £5, in 21 boroughs a rateable value of £4, and in 5 boroughs a rateable value of less than £4, would be necessary in order to enfranchise those to whom the franchise would be given by a £7 rental. Moreover, owing to the differences of rating which frequently prevailed in different parts of the same town, there would be inequalities in the operation of a rating franchise in the same borough. The ministry, however, had tendered resignation of their offices not only because of the effect of this motion but also because of the attitude of members during the previous divisions and debates. Patent to all had been the attempt to overweight the measure by an inclusion of bribery and corruption clauses, the attempt, without giving public notice, to postpone the clauses of enfranchisement for the clauses affecting the redistribution of seats, the attempt to raise the franchise when already the bill had been framed to conciliate those members who were timid or fastidious on the subject of Reform at the expense of those by whom Reform was ardently supported.¹

Earl Russell announced in the House of Lords that the resignations had been accepted. While taking occasion to give a history of the Reform movement during the last seven years, he justified the measure which had just been rejected as a fair and moderate one which had been opposed with a view of putting off Reform,² and attacked Lord Derby because of speeches made in condemnation of the measure. Lord Derby in reply criticized the hasty and inconsiderate conduct of the Government, and pointed out that the amendments from the ministerial side of the House had caused more trouble than any of his speeches.

Lord Derby himself was destined to worry over Reform before the passing of many months. To him, as leader of the Conservatives, was given the task of forming an administration.

Inasmuch as the Adullamites had been a party to the overthrow of the Russell-Gladstone ministry, it was but natural that their co-operation should be sought in the formation of a new ministry. Their terms, however, could not be accepted by the Conservatives;³ and after an attempt to utilize Lord Shaftesbury, Palmerstonian, philanthropist, and friend of the working classes, had failed, Derby had to give up the idea of making a Government on an enlarged basis. He chose Disraeli as his foremost man. The latter, after several unsuccessful attempts to enter Parliament—on the first occasion as a Radical—finally had been elected in 1837 under Tory auspices. Certain political ideas as expressed by pamphlets and by his novels Coningsby (1844) dealing with political conditions, and Sybil (1845) descriptive of the social relation between rich and poor, became the tenets of a considerable number of Tory followers. The passing of the Whig oligarchy in 1832 had made it possible, Disraeli believed, for the Crown and the old noble families to do something for the mass of the people, in which kind of activity the Liberals had been negligent. He had failed to follow Peel in the latter's espousal of the repeal of the Corn Laws and had caused a split in the Conservative party. When he became, in a short time, leader of the Conservatives in the House of Commons, he gave up, however, ideas of a sudden return to protectionist principles. He was successful as Chancellor of the Exchequer under Derby in 1852 and again in 1858 in the second Derby ministry. In the following year he tried to pass the Reform measure of 1859, but, as has been noted, failed. Brilliant, clever, and able, nevertheless as son of an apostate Jew he was looked at askance by British society. He now again became Chancellor of the Exchequer and as Derby's assistant probably had much to do with the selection of men and the distribution of offices. Stanley¹ became Foreign Secretary, General Peel Secretary of War, Walpole² Secretary of State for the Home Department, Lord Cranborne³ Secretary for India, the Earl of Carnarvon¹ Colonial Secretary, and Sir Stafford Northcote and Gathorne Hardy,² two men of talent in Disraeli's opinion, President of the Board of Trade and President of the Poor Law Board respectively. According to an authority it was a strong combination with very few weak spots—"a proof, in itself alone, of the success with which Disraeli had built up the Conservative party out of the ruins of the late 'forties, and had attracted to the service of the cause a goodly proportion of the intellect of the country."³

¹ Speech of June 26, Hansard, vol. clxxxiv, pp. 684-692.

² Cf. Annual Register, 1866, p. 159.

³ Vide George Saintsbury, The Earl of Derby (New York, 1892), p. 170, where the statement is made that the Adullamites would have been willing to join a Government under Lord Stanley, son of Lord Derby. Stanley was known as a very liberal Conservative and had been offered office in 1855 by Palmerston. In the Life of Disraeli, vol. iv, pp. 439 et seq., Monypenny and Buckle declare, however, that the Adullamites wanted the premiership to go to a Whig.

¹ Stanley had been Colonial Secretary in 1858 and subsequently President of the Board of Control.

² Walpole had occupied the same position in 1852 and 1858.

³ Later Lord Salisbury, leader of the Conservatives after Disraeli's death; at this time he was an independent Conservative.

As for Reform—a discussion of the subject was not renewed in Parliament during the remainder of the session. Lord Derby, in his ministerial statement on accession to office, touched most guardedly on the subject.⁴ He reserved to himself the most entire liberty as to whether the Government should or should not undertake to bring in a measure for the amendment of the representation of the people but promised that if there was "no reasonable prospect of passing a sound and satisfactory measure," the session would not be spent in the wasteful contest over a Reform bill.⁵

Disraeli, too, in his hustings speech on re-election declined to pledge himself to introduce a Reform bill in the following session. And he assured his constituents if we deal with the question at any time, we will deal with it in the spirit of the English Constitution. We shall not attempt to fashion or remodel the institutions of this country on any ¹According to Monypenny and Buckle, Carnarvon was appointed through the influence of Derby.

²Hardy had defeated Gladstone at Oxford.

³Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli, vol. iv, p. 445. Cf., also, George Saintsbury, The Earl of Derby, p. 170.

⁴Cf. opinion of the Edinburgh Review, January, 1867, p. 287.

⁵*Hansard*, vol. clxxxiv, p. 740.

foreign type whatever, whether they be American or whether they be French . . . we (who opposed the Liberal Reform bill) did not recognize that the rights of man should prevail in legislation, or that a numerical majority should dictate to an ancient nation of various political orders and classes.¹

But of the qualifications of himself and of his friends to deal with Reform—of that he expressed himself in almost sanguine terms.²—Yet the royal speech at the prorogation of Parliament on the tenth of August did not touch the subject of “the Representation of the People.”

Would the Conservatives bring in a bill during the 1867 session? That was a question asked and answered by almost every newspaper and magazine in the country during the autumn and early winter of 1866.³ Some of them thought that the people had spoken decisively in the Hyde Park episode; others began to realize the state of public mind only with the meetings held rather regularly in the northern towns. Before the opening of Parliament, however, not only did the newspapers and the magazines agree as to the necessity for action but the pamphleteer concurred with their opinions:

There is enough of anxiety to have the question settled; the timid fear prolonged agitation, and the man of business sees it hurts trade; the man of pleasure feels the subject a bore, and all grow weary of it. One party sees an opportunity to snatch advantages that may not soon occur again; and another fears, perhaps, that whatever bargain can be made now, there is small hope of making better hereafter.⁴

¹ The Times, July 14, 1866.

² Vide Edinburgh Review, January, 1867, p. 287.

³ Cf. supra, chapter iii.

⁴ William Rathbone, Soundings in Political Waters (Edinburgh, 1867), p. 30.

What did Disraeli and Derby think of the necessity for action?—Strange as it may seem, it was Derby rather than Disraeli who first saw that there was a genuine call for Reform.¹ It is true that Disraeli suggested on the twenty-ninth of July, shortly after the “famous Reform riot,” that a modified form of Gladstone’s bill be rushed through Parliament to stop agitation and “dish” Gladstone. When this suggestion was not accepted he seems to have been very slow to perceive the signs of the times. He was opposed to Derby’s opinion expressed in writing on the sixteenth of September that the Conservatives would have to deal with Reform and might proceed by resolutions. He was impatient with the Queen, who, becoming anxious that the question be settled, wanted to urge Gladstone and Russell, by a personal appeal, to aid the ministers in finding terms of agreement. Even in November he wrote to Derby, giving as his opinion that any dealing with the Reform question should take place by resolutions “which, though laying down a complete scheme, should end in a Royal Commission.” He must have realized that very little could be accomplished during the coming session by such a method of procedure. In a letter to Lord Cranborne, dated December 26, he wrote:²

I have throughout been against legislation, and continue so. Lord Derby, about the time you were here, thought it inevitable, but, as you know, his views are now modified.

It’s a difficult affair, but I think we shall pull through; the Whigs are very unanimous in wishing the question “settled”—but you and I are not Whigs.

Yet, as his biographer points out, his opinion gradually changed, for by mid-winter he permitted his Reform speeches to be published and on the third of January wrote to Derby saying that the Reform question was paramount. By this time the ministers of the realm as well as the journalists and magazine writers may be said to have felt the pulse of the country. The financial crisis, the Hyde Park riot, the popular demonstrations in various parts of the country had contributed to produce a feeling of insecurity and distrust. Something must be done.

¹ Documents for this statement quoted in Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli, vol. iv, pp. 453-454. The Queen even before Derby seems to have recognized the need of a real settlement. Ibid., p. 561.

² Ibid., p. 463.

Hence the royal speech on the opening of Parliament on February 5, 1867, expressed a desire for moderate deliberations on the state of the representation of the people in Parliament.¹ In the comments on the speech Earl Russell, speaking for the Liberals in the House of Lords, promised to consider upon its merits any bill which the Government should propose and said that he would rejoice to support one which should confer the franchise upon a large body of the artisans of the country who were well qualified to possess it. Any delusive attempt to deal with the question he denounced as only tending to foster agitation for manhood suffrage, which few members of either House of Parliament at present were disposed to support. In the House of Commons Gladstone said that the interests of the country demanded a speedy settlement of the question; it was the duty of Parliament to accept an adequate measure.

On the eleventh of February the Chancellor of the Exchequer in telling of the manner of proceeding declared that the question ought not to be an affair of party — that the House of Commons had incurred responsibility in the matter and that, therefore, in order to get the view of the House, proceeding should be by resolution. Procedure by resolutions, as has been mentioned, had been advised by Derby in September as well as at a somewhat later period.²

¹ Annual Register, 1867, p. 4.

² Vide Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli, chap. xiii.

Disraeli also had thought this manner of preceeding very desirable.¹ The resolutions, however, as brought forth were so vague as to please no one. Of the thirteen, the first stated that the number of electors for counties and boroughs ought to be increased; the second, that such increase might best be effected both by reducing the value of the qualifying tenement in counties and boroughs and by adding other franchises not dependent on such value; the third, that while it was desirable that a more direct representation should be given to the laboring class, it was contrary to the Constitution of the realm to give to any one class or interest a predominating power over the rest of the community; the fourth, that the occupation franchise in counties and boroughs should be based upon the principle of rating; the fifth, that the principle of plurality of votes would facilitate the settlement of the borough franchise on an extensive basis; the sixth, that it was expedient to revise the existing distribution of seats. Such platitudes caused the press, in a body, to express disappointment.² Members of the House, unable to curb their curiosity, questioned the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the extent of change. In vain did they put their questions, for he refused to promise explanation of the proposed resolutions before the twenty-fifth of February. In fact, Disraeli had good reasons for refusing to give information. He himself was not sure of the measure to be proposed. The cabinet was finding agreement almost impossible.

The disagreement among the cabinet members, in fact, led to the application of the principles of the resolutions (February 25) in a scheme known as the Ten-Minutes bill. The explanation of the origin of the name given to this scheme and the circumstances making necessary its introduction are as follows: ¹ General Peel, Secretary of State for War, had announced on the sixteenth of February his inability ² to sanction any reduction of the franchise and his intended resignation; later at the urging of his colleagues and the desire of the Queen he agreed to conform to the general opinion. The cabinet then decided to bring in a bill with household suffrage as a basis but with personal payment of rates and a residence qualification, etc., as checks. The discussion was settled agreeably at the cabinet meeting on Saturday, the twenty-third of February. "The Cabinet unanimous for the great plan" wrote Disraeli to his private secretary. He had promised to explain the plans to the House of Commons on Monday, the twenty-fifth. But on Sunday Lord Cranborne examined more closely the scheme, and concluded that its effect would be to throw the small boroughs almost entirely into the hands of voters of less than the £10 qualification. Such proceeding he did not think to be for the interest of the country. Carnarvon, Colonial Secretary, agreed with him. Hence on Monday morning, Disraeli and Derby had threats of the resignation of two of their colleagues. The cabinet, hastily summoned, could not be brought together much before half-past one, and by the time the situation was explained, it was after two. At two-thirty ³ Derby had to address the party; at four-thirty Disraeli was to address the House. Literally, the cabinet did not have "more than ten minutes in which to make up their minds" on their course. ⁴ They determined,

¹ Ibid., p. 459; resolutions had been of use in 1858 in the India bill.

² Cf. Malmesbury, Memoirs of an Ex-Minister, vol. ii, p. 365.

¹ The Beaconsfield papers, the addresses of Lord Derby to the House of Lords and of Sir John Pakington to his constituents in his reflection speech and various memoirs, give data.

² For a full account in the Beaconsfield papers, vide Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, pp. 495 et seq.

³ Pakington says at two o'clock.

⁴ The speech of Pakington is given in the Times, March 14, 1867.

in that brief time, to take up a milder scheme which had previously been drawn up in an attempt to please Peel.¹ This was the scheme Disraeli with no enthusiasm explained on the twenty-fifth.

Rising in a House crowded with many distinguished strangers, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the first place, took occasion to point out that since 1832 the middle class had governed the country, but that it now seemed proper that the working class should be granted some of the rights they desired. He then proceeded to an explanation of the proposed resolutions: there were to be some new or fancy franchises—those in boroughs, who could meet a certain educational requirement, about 10,000 in number, those who were depositors in savings banks, about 35,000, those who had £50 in public funds, about 7,000, and those who paid 20 s. in direct taxes, about 30,000, were to have a vote. The principle of plurality (i. e., the principle that a person who had a right to vote for a member of Parliament should vote in addition under any one new franchise which he might possess), however, would not be insisted upon. A £6 rating in the boroughs, as the occupiers' qualification, would give 130,000 voters and a £20 rating in the counties together with the fancy franchises would add 187,500 county voters. In all there would be an addition of some 400,000 voters.² There was to be a slight redistribution of seats. If the House liked the resolutions, as interpreted in this scheme (the Ten-Minutes "bill"), a moderate bill based on them would be brought in.

The House immediately showed that it did not like the resolutions. Lowe of the Adullamites asked the Government to do away with such ambiguous and abstract resolutions and bring in a bill. He intimated that they were now playing to keep in office, that they were willing for the House to "say what you like to us, only, for God's sake leave us our places." But "why are they to have the mark of Cain set upon them, that nobody may kill them?" Mr. Bright said that discussion of the resolutions would be a mere waste of time. He asked for and in fact promised to support a measure which should be big enough to do away with agitation during his life. Mr. Laing of the Adullamites thought that the scheme did not have finality. He would prefer household suffrage. Even friends of the Government were not favorably inclined.¹ Further consideration of the resolutions was put off until the twenty-eighth of February.

¹ Vide Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 500.

² By the bill of 1866, the total number of new voters would have been 400,000.

In the meantime, two hundred and eighty-nine of the Liberals met at Gladstone's house on the twenty-sixth and resolved to support an amendment urging the Government to bring in a bill.² But Disraeli was ahead of them. Realizing that his proposals were not pleasing to those who wanted no Reform and that they were too moderate for those who did want Reform, the Chancellor of the Exchequer determined not to go on with the resolutions. Hence at the meeting of the House that evening he announced the Government's intention of bringing in a bill. He explained that the chief object of the resolutions had been accomplished in that the proposals had been given a fair and candid consideration.

Disraeli could not at once bring in a bill. He had first to consider whether he should adhere to the Ten-Minutes "bill" and keep a cabinet intact or whether he should bring in a bill based on household suffrage—i, e., the scheme originally settled upon, the twenty-third of February—and lose Cranborne, Carnarvon and Peel. Which plan would his own party favor; what attitude would the Radicals take; how would the Liberals manœuvre; with what action would the country be pleased?—these were some of the questions over which Disraeli had to ponder.

¹ Cf. the ministerial explanation of Lord Derby in the House of Lords, Hansard, vol. clxxxv, pp. 1284-1289.

² Annual Register, 1867, p. 29, and News of the World, March 3, 1867.

That a number of his own party stood for the bolder course, Disraeli soon became aware. Henley, one of the Conservative leaders,¹ had declared in favor of household suffrage in 1859,² and would support such a plan. Members³ of the Carlton Club⁴ gave their support to the movement. A feeling that the party should settle the question, was growing rapidly among the Tories, Monypenny and Buckle declare,⁵ as was also the feeling that “a generous extension to a new and respectable class, the rate-paying householders, might well inure to the benefit of a party which claimed to be national, and dethrone one which was still largely oligarchical.”⁶ And when, three days before the bill was to be brought in, the more liberal plan was explained at a meeting at Derby’s almost all of the 195 present approved. That the Radicals could be counted on for the greater change was also well known to Disraeli. Bright had promised, in the open, to accept the bill which would

¹ Henley was not, however, a minister. For his attitude toward the suffrage question, vide Roundell Palmer, 1st Earl of Selborne, Memorials, 4 vols. (London, 1896-1898), vol. i, pt. ii, p. 64.

² Hansard, vol. clii, pp. 1064 et seq., and vol. cliii, p. 1217.

³ I. e., a majority.

⁴ The leading Conservative political club of London, founded in 1832 by the Duke of Wellington.

⁵ Vol. iv, p. 508; the Times, March 11, 1867, expresses a similar opinion in an editorial.

⁶ But Stanley declared in the ministerial explanations of the fifth of March that he could conceive no circumstances which would cause the Government to “reduce the franchise to an almost unlimited extent.” Hansard, vol. clxxxv, p. 1364.

settle the question for a given period, and promised, in private, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do all he could fairly to help a bill through if the right thing were done.¹ Gladstone recognized that Bright would help the Conservatives if they gave him his demands. Writing from Rome to Brand in October, 1866, he said: "We have no claim upon him (Bright), more than the government have on us; and I imagine he will part company the moment he sees his way to more than we would give him."² That Gladstone would go further than the Ten-Minutes "bill" and hence get the country back of him had to be taken into consideration by the Conservative leaders. Writing confidentially to Lord Derby on the twenty-sixth of February, Disraeli said:

I dined alone with Walpole, who thinks that our fall now is only an affair of a little time, assuming that, in our present feeble position, all the sections will reunite for a vote against which it would be absurd to appeal to the country. That, he thinks, is Gladstone's tactic: to play with us until we are contemptible. As Sir Lawrence Palk says, "Till he comes in with household suffrage, which is getting riper every minute."³

Writing to Lord Derby on the twenty-seventh he expressed the opinion that Gladstone would go slowly but by the time the bill was in committee would be "prepared to try five against six" and would probably succeed in passing an amendment calling for such a substitution.⁴ That the country would be much better pleased with a larger bill, Disraeli knew from the Reform meetings. And when the larger bill was brought in, the Reform meeting at Birming-

¹ Trevelyan, Life of Bright, pp. 370 and 371.

² Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, p. 223.

³ Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 504.

⁴ Ibid., p. 506.

ham on March 22 accepted "with great satisfaction the recognition of household suffrage as the basis of the franchise in the boroughs," although, of course, opinion was against the checks.¹ That even a number of the Adullamites thought household suffrage a good basis was made known to Disraeli.² Hence influenced by various considerations, he determined to take the bolder course. The cabinet decided to revert to the plan of the twenty-third of February. On the fourth of March it became known that Cranborne, Carnarvon, and Peel had resigned. Lord Derby expressed to the House of Lords the regret he felt at parting with three of his most important and most valued colleagues but promised to put before Parliament in a very short time the measure which the majority of the cabinet had in the first instance considered the more desirable. Lord Carnarvon explained his resignation by declaring that he was unable to sanction the innovations contemplated by the Government. On the following day, Peel and Cranborne gave their reasons for withdrawing. Lord Cranborne imparted the following information to the House of Commons: on the sixteenth of February he first heard of the more nearly radical proposition. He stated at once that the proposition was inadmissible and thought that it had been abandoned. But on the nineteenth the proposition was revived with the statement of certain statistics, not at that time complete. When he had time to investigate the complete figures carefully, after the cabinet meeting on the twenty-third, he concluded that though the figures stated in block, had had fair seeming, when looked at in actual working they would operate in a very large number of boroughs by giving practically household suffrage.³

¹ The Times, March 23, 1867.

² Cf. Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli, vol. iv, p. 508.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxv, pp. 1348-1349.

Whether or not the ministry was actually to blame for the vacillations of the last few weeks, due, as it is sometimes stated,¹ to a lack of consideration and study upon the bill introduced, it caused the country and the House of Commons to become impatient at its irresolution. "The Conservative leaders were in the position of a stage manager who, when the audience are assembled and the time for raising the curtain had arrived, has not resolved what piece he will put upon the stage."² With a ministry in which Cranborne had been succeeded by Northcote, Peel by Pakington, and Carnarvon by the Duke of Buckingham,³ Disraeli proceeded to bring in the original scheme.

On the eighteenth of March, this Reform bill was explained to a crowded House.⁴ The Chancellor of the Exchequer first stated the Government's object, namely, to strengthen the character and functions of that House, and to establish them on a broad and popular basis. But popular privileges and democratic rights were not identical. Nay, they were contradictory; he hoped that it would never be the fate of this country to live under a democracy, and this bill had no tendency in that direction. This bill followed out the plan of Lord Dunkellin's motion of last year, in that rating was made the basis of valuation. Every householder paying his own rates and meeting a two-years residence qualification should be admitted to vote. This provision would admit 237,000 men living in houses under £10.⁵

¹ Vide Homersham Cox, A History of the Reform Bills of 1866 and 1867 (London, 1868), p. 104.

² Ibid.

³ He had been Lord President, probably through the influence of Disraeli, whose friend he was.

⁴ Vide Annual Register, 1867, pp. 40 et seq.

⁵ Cox, pp. 108 et seq., shows that Disraeli's figures are too high. He concludes that the net number of electors will be fifty per cent less than the gross number of rated occupiers.

Every facility would be given to have the 486,000 unenfranchised householders¹ not paying their own rates (i. e., compound householders), make payment of their own rates, that the right of voting might be obtained. The bill would confer the franchise on payers of 20 s. direct taxes. Householders in towns paying this tax would have the dual vote and such a right would add more than 200,000. It also would contain an education franchise which would admit 35,000, and would give votes to the extent of 70,000 to holders of savings banks' deposits and funded property of £50. In all more than 1,000,000 would be added to the borough constituency. In the counties a £15 rating would take the place of the £50 rental. By this reduction 171,000 would be added to county constituencies and the lateral franchises would bring the total to more than 300,000. Cumulative voting and three-cornered constituencies did not meet with the favor of the Government. According to the redistribution scheme, thirty seats would be affected. New boroughs would be given fourteen, counties would be given fifteen, the London University would be given one.

As soon as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had finished explaining his bill, Gladstone rose and in one of his most brilliant speeches attacked the scheme. He objected to the estimates of the Government, declaring that only 140,000 would be admitted by extending the franchise to all who personally paid their rates. Rating would leave the franchise at the direction of the vestry; the practise with regard to compounders varied in almost every parish, hence many anomalies would arise. Moreover, a principle had been set up only to be knocked down again by the use of checks. Additions to the bill would have to be introduced—a lodger franchise, for instance, was needed. Some of the Conservatives, too, showed opposition. Mr. Beresford Hope spoke on the Conservatives outbidding Liberals in a Liberal market. Lord Cranborne declared that they soon would have household suffrage, for the checks must go. To this statement Disraeli replied that the Government would never introduce household suffrage pure and simple. Leave was then given to bring in the bill and the second reading moved for the twenty-fifth of March. Before that date, a meeting of the Liberals was held at Gladstone's house (March 21) to consider their course toward the bill. Although Gladstone himself was opposed¹ to the second reading he did not think that the general disposition of the meeting would bear him out in his opposition.² But if the ministers would not abandon the dual voting and equalise the privileges and facilities of the enfranchised in all cases, however the qualification arose, then the measure, he thought, should not be permitted to go into committee. Bright took about the same attitude as Gladstone.

¹ Cox, A History of the Reform Bills, p. 113, complains that this is not done in the original bill. Studying the statistics carefully he comes to the conclusion that the original bill of 1867 would have added a smaller number of voters in the boroughs than the franchise bill of 1866.

The debate on the second reading of the bill lasted two nights. Gladstone opened the discussion. Many alterations³ were needed on this bill:⁴ a lodger franchise must be inserted; means to stop traffic in votes must be found; distinction between different classes of ratepaying householders must be abolished;⁵ the taxpaying franchise and dual vote

¹ Vide Blackwood's, May, 1867, p. 643.

² Cf. Cox, A History of the Reform Bills, p. 133.

³ Cf. Cox, p. 134, who says these alterations were actually made through Gladstone.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxvi, pp. 472-504.

⁵ Gladstone's exact words are: "It seems to me we must do away with the vexatious distinctions that now exist between compound householders in a condition of life and society that are recognized by law as fitting them for the franchise, and those persons of the very same condition not being compound householders."

must be abandoned; the redistribution part must be enlarged, the county franchise reduced and voting papers ¹ dropped. For himself he was sorry that the £6 rating had been given up and thought a definite line in rating desirable. Hardy attempted to answer Gladstone. The Government believed in mutual concession and forbearance, but if, as Mr. Gladstone had said, every leading provision of the bill required revision, then the division ought to take place at this stage.² After combating the arguments of the Opposition leader, he repeated that the Government declined to accept Mr. Gladstone's dictum. They wished for discussion and would not show themselves unreasonable, if met in a reasonable spirit. They did intend, however, to stand by the main principle of accompanying a free enfranchisement by judicious limitations.

Mr. Bright, like Mr. Gladstone, found much to criticise in the bill. It had the marks upon it of being the product, not of the friends, but of the enemies of Reform. It gave nothing to the workingmen, for to the few enfranchised there was the set-off of a vote to 200,000 of a higher class. Hence the dissatisfaction throughout the country would not cease. For himself, he would give the warmest support to a fair and honest measure, but it was impossible to assist a Government which would not tell frankly what it intended, what it stood by, what it would get rid of.

To Gladstone and Bright the Chancellor of the Exchequer replied in one of his noteworthy speeches.³ The tone and manner of Mr. Gladstone had not been pleasing but the Government was willing to make many changes in the bill. They had never had the idea that much consideration would not be required in committee. They would have to consider, as Mr. Gladstone had suggested, the lodger franchise. He declared himself to be the father of this suffrage, and thought that the House would adopt it if satisfactory arguments should be urged in its favor in committee. Mr. Gladstone, last year, however, had thought its effect would not be great, and the other objections, he promised, would also receive consideration in committee. He defended the principle of personal rating as against the £5 rating—the rigid line for which Gladstone was contending. The Government was laying down a principle, and had not cared so much about the numbers to be admitted. The dual vote which Mr. Bright had opposed so warmly would not be insisted upon. He again asked the co-operation of the House in passing a bill; the ministry was convinced that their duty was not to desert their posts until this question had been settled; and he entreated the House:

¹ Clause 29 dealt with voting papers.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxvi, pp. 506-507.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxvi, pp. 642-664.

Act with us cordially and candidly, assist us to carry this measure. We will not shrink from deferring to your suggestions so long as they are consistent with the main object of this Bill which we have never concealed from you, and which is to preserve the representative character of the House of Commons. Act with us, I say, cordially and candidly, you will find on our side complete reciprocity of feeling. Pass the Bill, and then change the Ministry if you like.

This “reasonable and attractive appeal” is to Monypenny and Buckle a turning point of the session: “it practically secured the carrying of a Reform bill under the conduct of the Government.”¹

To the Annual Register his speech gave the impression that the Government would yield to pressure and would discard obnoxious and impracticable provisions, thus taking a course which would lead "to the ultimate acceptance of the measure."¹

¹*Vide* Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, pp. 526 and 527, where is given additional material upon the effect of this important speech.

From this time it was felt that the probabilities of a settlement of the question before the termination of the Session were much increased; the only material doubt that remained depending on the power of the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Commons to carry his supporters along with him in that course of concession for which it was quite evident that he was individually prepared.²

The Spectator, too, was influenced by the speech and suggested that Disraeli really felt that the country needed a bill, and, having passed it, would resign.³ Lord Derby was much pleased with the success of Disraeli and wrote to him to that effect.⁴ Now, for the first time, he announced to the Queen a sanguine hope of carrying a bill through in the course of the present session. The House of Commons, for its part, passed the second reading without a division.

Before the House went into Committee on the eighth of April disagreement in the Liberal party had tended to strengthen the position of the Conservatives. Gladstone tried to strike at the bill through the compound householder. A large proportion of occupiers under £10, not paying their own rates, but giving their proportion to the landlord who paid the assessment for all the occupiers, would be excluded, according to the terms of the bill, from the franchise. If they did choose to pay the rates directly, their assessment would need to be larger since they or the landlord would have to make up a discount formerly received by him for pay-

¹ Annual Register, p. 53.

² Ibid.

³ The Spectator, March 30, 1867.

⁴ Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli, vol. iv, p. 527.

ing his tenants' rates in a lump; the increased assessment was referred to by certain members as a fine placed upon the working class.¹ Gladstone, making this point the issue with the Government, called together a meeting of the Liberals at his house on the fifth of April. There were present 259 members of the House of Commons. He proposed an amendment which the party agreed to:

That it be an instruction to the Committee that they have power to alter the law of rating; and to provide that in every Parliamentary borough the occupiers of tenements below a given ratable value be relieved from liability to personal rating, with a view to fix a line for the borough franchise, at and above which all occupiers shall be entered on the rate-book, and shall have equal facilities for the enjoyment of such franchise as a residential occupation franchise.²

Gladstone wished in fact to substitute a £5 rating franchise for the borough franchise of the Government but neither the public nor the radical element in the Liberal party agreed with him.³ The Times saw the strange sight of "an attempt made by the Liberal party to repress the enfranchising zeal of a Conservative Administration."⁴ The London Working Men's Association at its (adjourned) annual meeting expressed its strong opposition to the drawing of any arbitrary line of rating—whether £5 or any other sum—below which householders should not be admitted to the franchise, and suggested that Gladstone devote his energies to obtaining a reduction in the residential term of qualification, and the insertion of a lodger franchise.⁵ The dis-

¹ Cox, A History of the Reform Bills of 1866 and 1867, pp. 113-116.

² Annual Register, 1867, p. 55.

³ Vide the Times, April 6, 1867.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ The Times, April 17, 1867.

satisfied Liberals held a meeting in the Tea-room of the House of Commons and resolved not to support the amendment, and hence the motion had to be withdrawn.¹ In Sir Robert Phillimore's Journal under the date of April 9 is found the following summary of the situation:² "Entire collapse of Gladstone's attack on government yesterday. Tea-room schism of Liberal members, including the House of Commons Russell. Disraeli's insolent triumph." This first breakdown of the Opposition party was justly regarded by the Annual Register "as symptomatic of the disunion which would render their efforts to dictate the terms of the bill unavailing." Certain it is that the troubles of the Liberal leaders contributed not a little to give strength and confidence to the ministers.³

After considerable debating by various members upon the bill itself and the actions of the Government, the House went into committee. And now, once again, Gladstone determined to test the strength of his opponents and proposed an amendment to the effect that the direct and personal payment of rates by the householder should not be essential for obtaining the franchise. But the provision was to apply only to those whose premises were of the yearly value of £5.⁴ Gladstone himself defended his position by saying that the rates of two-thirds of the houses under £10 value were compounded for, therefore the working class would still be without the vote and hence would continue to agitate, and that too great expenditures of money and of time would baffle any attempts made by them to pay their own rates. But the motion, standing as it did "for a hard and fast line,"

¹ Annals of Our Time, April 8. There were forty or fifty Liberal members who dissented from Gladstone's policy.

² Quoted from Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, p. 232.

³ Annual Register, 1867, p. 56.

⁴ Cf. Annals of Our Time, April 11, 1867.

was regarded as being reactionary. Lord Cranborne, for instance, the Conservative who had withdrawn from a too liberal Conservative cabinet, announced that he would support Gladstone. Many of the Liberals, however, refused to follow their leader and when the division was taken, the Government was found to have triumphed by 310 to 289. "The supporters of the Government were found upon the Opposition benches; their opponents sat beside and behind them."¹ The Government was well pleased with the result; the country gentlemen rushed forward to shake hands with the leader who was said to have betrayed them; "Dizzy" proudly went home to his wife.² Gladstone was so discouraged by this "smash" that it was rumored that he would give up the leadership of the Opposition.

But when the House came together after Easter, Gladstone still remained "at the service of his party." He was backed, too, by Bright who, speaking at Birmingham during the vacation, had declared that the bill had fallen into the hands of enemies by the defeat of the amendment and that the Tories were using the measure for Tory purposes.³ Yet Gladstone announced that for the present he would not lead in amending.

After the House had resumed its discussions of the bill in committee on May 2, one⁴ of the Radicals proposed a twelve-months instead of the two-years residence requirement. Sir John Pakington, for the Government, said that the amendment could not be adopted. If two years is a proper time, why not apply it to a £10 householder, came the question, and on the division the Government lost by a majority

¹ The Times, April 13, 1867. Bright spoke and voted with Gladstone.

² T. E. Kebbel, Lord Beaconsfield and Other Tory Memories (New York, 1907), pp. 39 and 40.

³ The Times, April 23, 1867.

⁴ Mr. Ayrton.

of eighty-one. "They promptly put in practice the readiness to defer to the opinion of the House which they had repeatedly announced."¹ In fact, as Malmesbury wrote,² the laissez-aller system was being followed by the Government. They were trying to make the best they could of the situation, but were constantly yielding something. In this particular case, moreover, Disraeli may have been influenced by the attitude of the workingmen. At least one deputation³ had told him that the bill was good except for the residence provision. And furthermore, in order to pass a bill,⁴ the great Conservative leader would be willing to stretch such a point as this.

Next it was moved to procure the enfranchisement of lodgers. The amendment, however, was withdrawn when the Government promised to embody the lodger franchise in their bill: lodgings of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of £10 or upwards plus one year residence became the basis of the qualification.

Then came up again the question of the "compound householder." Mr. Hibbert, a Liberal, thought that householders under £10 should come in on the same terms as the compound householders at and above that amount, namely, by simply paying the amount of composition and not the full rate, and moved an amendment to that effect. Gladstone, Bright, John Sturt Mill, all spoke for this plan and against Disraeli's proposal that "a compound occupier claiming to be registered as a voter should be rated as an ordinary occupier" (i. e., should pay the full rate).⁵ Disraeli in the

¹ Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 537.

² Malmesbury, Memoirs of an Ex-Minister, vol. ii, pp. 369-370.

³ Vide the Times, May 1, 1867.

⁴ Cf. comments in Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 536, on Stanley's note to Disraeli.

⁵ Cf. Cox, A History of the Reform Bills, p. 178.

test was able to defeat Hibbert's amendment by a vote of 256 to 322.¹

But at this point the Chancellor of the Exchequer did the surprising thing. Mr. Hodgkinson, a Liberal, had moved to abolish composition altogether. All those rated for the poor would be given the franchise. In his opposition to the Government, Gladstone defended the motion. If the Reform question was to be settled, if the agitation was to be stopped, such a course must be taken. And then Disraeli spoke! The amendment would really carry out the principle of the bill; the Government having had intentions of using a similar clause earlier had struck it out lest they encumber the ship so much as to imperil the voyage. Therefore, he would offer no opposition to the provision, and if the amendment were withdrawn he would undertake to carry out its object. There was a sensation in the House. Gladstone, who had anticipated the defeat of the motion by a majority of a hundred, wrote long afterwards:

Never have I undergone a stranger emotion of surprise than when, as I was entering the House, our whip met me and stated that Disraeli was about to support Hodgkinson's motion. But so it was, and the proposition was adopted without disturbance, as if it had been an affair of trivial importance.²

Bright, we are told,³ "noted the victory of his cause very quietly:—'Government accepted our demands on Borough Franchise.'" Others of the Radicals showed their great joy at the turn events had taken. Mr. Forster, for instance, was found dancing down the lobby.⁴ In the House he

¹ Consult Cox, pp. 179 and 180, on Disraeli's tactics.

² Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, pp. 225 and 226.

³ Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, p. 377.

⁴ All this happened on the seventeenth of May.

observed that there was a hope of settling the borough franchise in a way that would be satisfactory to the country. The conservative wing of the Liberals was very bitter. Mr. Lowe was able to give his usual tirade against the ignorance and what not of the commonalty; the restrictions had now been swept away; the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not shown his supporters his whole plan at once, for they would have been frightened at it. Among the Conservatives there was much surprise. Disraeli had made his decision without the advice even of his chief counselor, Gathorne Hardy, and in a letter to him explains that he had taken his position because ¹ the public mind was ready for the change, because the Liberals had started the move and would have been able to make a coup,² because, without receding from his position and principle of a rating and residential franchise, he had taken a step "which would destroy the present agitation and extinguish Gladstone and Company." Hardy supported his chief. Later he wrote: "We had so far stepped in that we could not, on such a point, draw back, but it was a new proof that a great measure ought not to be in the hand of a minority, but with those who can mould and resist the moulding of others."³ In the House, Mr. Henley, of the Conservatives, backed up the Government: he considered this proposal the most conservative that could be made, considering how often the question had been mooted in the House, and how much agitation had been going on out of doors. Lord Cranborne, on the other hand, was opposed to such startling changes.

And by accepting the amendment Disraeli so materially

¹ Vide letter to Hardy in Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, pp. 540-541.

² Contrast what Gladstone and Disraeli have to say on this point: Gladstone expected the amendment to fail; Disraeli says that it would have carried.

³ Gathorne Hardy, A Memoir, 2 vols. (London, 1910), vol. i, pp. 208-210.

✓ altered the character of the bill that for all practical purposes it became a new measure.¹ All occupiers of tenements, not disqualified by the receipt of parochial relief, change of residence and certain other conditions which affected all classes of electors, were placed upon the electoral lists. Cox estimated that over 300,000 borough voters were added as the effect of Mr. Hodgkinson's amendment.² The original bill added over 100,000 voters; so that excluding lodgers, there would be a total increase of over 400,000. "It thus appears that the effect of the momentous amendment was to extend the franchise almost four times as much as was originally contemplated." Inasmuch as there were less than 500,000 borough electors according to the electoral returns of 1865-1866, it follows that the effect of the amendment was nearly to double the borough constituency. ✓ The large addition in the number of voters of the working class put England well on the way to democracy.

The question of the county franchise had then to be taken up. By the original clause the occupation franchise had been fixed at a £15 rateable value. Locke King, a Liberal, wished to substitute a £10 rating and when Disraeli showed a willingness to compromise on the £12 line, Gladstone recommended the withdrawal of King's motion.³

The clauses on "the fancy franchises" were soon dealt with. One of the members pointed out that since they had got rid of the dual vote, had established a lodger franchise, and had based the borough franchise on household suffrage, these fancy franchises were entirely unnecessary.¹ Hence the educational franchise, now supported by Mr. Fawcett alone, was given up, the clause giving the franchise to those who had certain sums in the savings banks or in the public funds, was struck out after a slight protest from Disraeli, and the dual vote was done away with. That part of the Reform question which related to the franchise and which had caused trouble for so many ministries had finally been completed.

¹ Cox, History of the Reform Bills, pp. 201 et seq.

² The statistics of Disraeli and Cox, it will be noted, are by no means identical; the borough voters numbered 488,920 in 1865 (Accounts and Papers, 1866, [3626] lvii, 215); 1,210,001 in 1868 (Accounts and Papers, 1877, [432] lxviii, 318).

³ After much discussion it was agreed that a man might be a voter for a county, who had an estate in copyhold, or any other tenure, for his life, of the clear yearly value of £5, or was the holder of a lease, for not less than sixty years originally, of lands or tenements of the clear yearly value of £5.

Redistribution now became the subject of discussion. Mr. Laing brought forth a scheme much more extensive than that proposed by the Government. A population of 10,000 rather than of 7,000 as the Government had fixed it, was to be the minimum for returning two members by any borough. He also further proposed the grouping of some of the smaller boroughs. A small addition should be made to the members in the House in order to give Scotland the number of representatives it deserved.² Six towns with a population of 150,000 each, should have their representatives increased from two to three, and four towns with a population exceeding 50,000 which now had one member, should have two members. Although Disraeli spoke against the proposal,³ so many of the Conservatives were for it, when Laing gave way on the point of grouping, that it was carried in the test. And after the Whitsuntide recess, the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the thirteenth of June, gave announcement of the propositions which the Government had to make. Every borough with a population less than

¹ Sir R. Palmer, Hansard, vol. clxxxvii, p. 1236.

² Mr. Laing represented Wick Burghs, Scotland.

³ Vide Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 544, for evidence that Disraeli really wanted this measure passed, although he spoke against it.

10,000 which returned two members, should now return one. This action together with the disfranchisement of several corrupt boroughs would give 45 seats for reappropriation. Of these, nineteen were to be given to boroughs, one to the University of London and twenty-five to counties. Mr. Laing was disappointed that additional representation had not been given to six or seven large towns and took occasion to move that additional members be given to them. Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Baines stood for the amendment. Disraeli strongly opposed it. On the division it was rejected by 247 to 239. Later, however, the committee did grant a third member to Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, and Leeds, and consequently the number of new boroughs was correspondingly limited.¹

Other amendments dealing with various topics were presented at different times. A motion "of rather singular character" made by John Stuart Mill, was a proposal to enable women to vote. Mill, declaring that taxation and representation should co-exist, first placed this question seriously before Parliament, but many of his colleagues gave a jocular character to the discussion.² On the test the motion was negatived 196 to 73, and although the subject was brought up often after 1870 it was not favorably acted upon in the nineteenth century.

A clause of the bill authorizing the use of voting papers in lieu of personal voting at the polls was attacked especially by some of the Liberals. The ballot, demanded by the Radicals in 1832 and by the Chartists, was still regarded with hostile eyes by the majority of the official class. The ¹ Thomas Chisholm Anstey, Notes upon the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (London, 1867), conveniently gives the schedules, the Act of 1867 together with the original bill, and many returns relating to the franchise and redistribution.

² Annual Register, 1867, p. 72.

Reform League did not have influence enough to change that majority into a minority. Disraeli himself spoke for the clause but admitted that "there was much to be said on both sides." The clause was discarded and when the House of Lords added to the bill a motion that "any voter for a county or borough may, in compliance with the provisions hereinafter contained, give his vote by a voting paper instead of personally," the addition was rejected by the Commons.¹

Representation of minorities was another subject on which proposals were made. Mr. Lowe moved that at any contested election for a county or a borough every voter should be entitled to a number of votes equal to the number of vacant seats, and might give all such votes to one candidate or to many, as he liked. The minority would thus get representation. The proposition was not well received in the House of Commons. Disliked by Gladstone, Bright, and Disraeli, it was defeated by a vote of 314 to 173. In the House of Lords, however, a minority provision moved by Lord Cairns—that at a contested election for any county or borough represented by three members, no person should vote for more than two candidates²—was carried by a majority of 91 and was accepted in the House of Commons by a majority of 49. The clause had the general effect of causing the election of a member from the party unrepresented heretofore. In some places, however, it was seen that a careful distribution of votes in such a way that each of the three candidates from the dominant party would receive only the number strictly necessary to obtain the requisite majority at the poll, led to the selection of the three members and the exclusion of any representative from the minority. The organization which obtained the desired results by controlling the activity of the electors came to be known as the Caucus and was an important development in party electoral machinery.¹ On the whole, the minority provision was not so successful that advocates of Hare's scheme² did not desire change.

¹ For the future of the ballot vide chap. vi.

² In the City of London which had four seats, an elector was to vote for only three candidates.

After a discussion of the schedules specifying the boroughs and counties to be affected by the increase or decrease of members, or the boon of enfranchisement, had been finished, the bill finally emerged from the committee "in its amended shape on the ninth of July; when, amidst considerable cheering, the Preamble, which is always ¹A. Lawrence Lowell, The Government of England, 2 vols. (New York, 1917, new edition), vol. i, pp. 483 et seq., and M. Ostrogorski, Democracy and the Organization of Political Parties, 2 vols. (New York, 1902), vol. i, pp. 161 et seq.

²Thomas Hare (1806-91) was a political reformer who wanted to secure proportional representation of all classes including minorities. His views were set forth in his Treatise on the Election of Representatives, Parliamentary and Municipal (1st edition, 1859). Much was written for this system and John Stuart Mill presented the plan in 1867 in an amendment for the representation of minorities. According to Mill's explanation in the House of Commons votes should be received in every locality for others than the local candidates, and if there were found in the whole kingdom other electors, in the proper number, who fixed their choice on the same person, that person should be declared duly elected. The number of votes needed to elect would, of course, depend on the number of members of the House compared with the total number of electors in the country. Lest a few popular names should get nearly all the votes and many voters, therefore, lose in reality their votes, a second name was to be put on the voting paper for whom the vote could be used if it was not required by the candidate who stood first. In case this second candidate also should not need the vote, the voter might add a third, etc. The mode of sorting the voting papers is discussed in detail in Hare's book. Mill pointed out that the scheme would do away with the danger of having some classes in the nation swamped by other classes (a fact which would please conservative persons) and would permit everybody to be represented (a fact pleasing to democrats). Cf. Hansard, vol. clxxxvii, pp. 1347 et seq.

considered last, was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be reported to the House." ¹

Of the amendments now presented, none were of importance.² Finally on the fifteenth of July the motion was made to read the Reform bill a third time. A last opportunity was presented for a review of the measure itself or of its passage, and several of the leading members took advantage of that opportunity. Viscount Cranborne, leading seceder from the cabinet, cried out that all the precautions, guaranties, and securities of the second reading had disappeared. "If it be a Conservative triumph," said he, "to have introduced a Bill guarded with precautions and securities, and to have abandoned every one of those precautions and securities at the bidding of your opponents, then in the whole course of your annals I will venture to say the Conservative party has won no triumph so signal as this."³ The result of the bill would be that 800,000 would be added as voters and that there would be 1,000,000 workingmen as against 500,000 of the other classes. But—he was the "champion of a forlorn cause."

And Mr. Lowe also complained—"We are about, on this momentous occasion, to enter upon a new era, when the bag which holds the winds will be untied, and we shall be surrounded by a perpetual whirl of change, alteration, innovation, and revolution."⁴ To him the principle of the bill was the principle of numbers as against wealth and intellect. England now must necessarily turn her attention to the education of the masses. But another of the Adullamites, Lord Elcho, quite gladly accepted the bill as a satisfactory

¹ Annual Register, 1867, p. 87.

² One change, however, allowed a holder of certain offices to change to another without vacating his seat.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxviii (July 15), pp. 1526-1539.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxviii, p. 1540.

settlement; to go down at once to household suffrage was much safer than to admit merely a portion of the working classes.

Mr. Bright, too, was not sorry that the House had agreed to the bill although it had gone farther than he had expected it to go. He had always contended, he said, that household suffrage was the best permanent foundation for the franchise even when he had been ready to accept as compromises, propositions falling short of his own views.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, giving the last of the important speeches, declared that the Government had acted in a consistent manner in every respect; that they had followed out a suggestion of 1859 in basing the borough franchise on household suffrage; that they had never been in agreement with those who advocated the admission of a certain portion of the working classes to serve as a sort of Praetorian guard to the middle classes; that they had done well in offering the resolutions inasmuch as the House had finally accepted the policy on which they were based; that the securities had not been yielded to Mr. Gladstone's imperious dictations but more to the wishes of the Conservative party. In support of the latter statement he said that out of twenty-six divisions in committee, Gladstone had voted in eighteen against the Government.¹ He acknowledged the assistance and co-operation of the House and concluded by asserting that he did not believe the country to be in danger. "I think England is safe" he declared, "in something much more precious than her accumulated capital—her accumulated experience; she is safe in her national character, in her fame, in the tradition of a thousand years, and in that glorious future which I believe awaits her."² The motion was then made and the question proposed "that the Bill be now read the third time." "There was a loud and general cry of 'Aye,'" says the Annual Register, "and only one solitary voice uttered 'No.' Whereupon the further question 'That the bill do pass' was declared, amidst considerable cheering, to be carried."¹

¹ Disraeli fails to go into detail in this matter.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxviii, pp. 1599-1614.

The House of Lords now had the opportunity to express its opinions on Reform. Gladstone, writing years after the passage of the Reform bill of 1867 had become an event of the past, was of the belief that the Government counted on the Lords blocking their measure or at least putting in important restrictions on the granting of the franchise.² Public opinion, he thought, made it impossible, however, for the Lords to pursue such a course. And whether or not Gladstone's belief was the correct one, the historian of to-day may assume without much doubt that the upper House would have been unwilling to accept such a radical measure without having pressure put upon it, had the measure come from the hands of the Liberals.³ As it was, there were times during the debates when opposition became strong. However, Lord Derby got the House fairly well in hand at the beginning by summoning to a meeting at his official residence those members whom he regarded as the supporters of his administration. There he asked that the measure should be passed as speedily as possible and with as few alterations as possible. Those present agreed to this request. Many of them may have thought in terms of their chief when he so well defended the bill with that simple argument attributed to him: "Don't you see how it has dished the Whigs?"⁴

¹ Annual Register, 1867, p. 91.

² Cf. Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, p. 226; but vide also Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, pp. 550-551.

³ Vide Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, p. 379.

⁴ Cf. Granville's speech in Hansard, vol. clxxxviii, pp. 1856-1863, and also the Spectator, August 10, 1867.

In the discussions of the bill and the amendments in the House of Lords the reader will find few arguments which had not been given previously in the House of Commons. A few amendments were adopted; the two of importance dealt with the use of voting papers and the representation of minorities.¹ On the whole, the Earl of Derby was much pleased with the "spirit of impartiality and consideration" in which the House dealt with the measure. He acknowledged the experimental character of the bill:

No doubt we are making a great experiment and "taking a leap in the dark,"² but I have the greatest confidence in the sound sense of my fellow countrymen; and I entertain a strong hope that the extended franchise which we are now conferring upon them will be the means of placing the institutions of this country on a firmer basis, and that the passing of this measure will tend to increase the loyalty and contentment of a great portion of Her Majesty's subjects.³

The bill was passed and sent to the Commons. Disraeli recommended that the amendments of the Lords be adopted. In spite of the opposition of Bright and Gladstone the "restricted vote" proposal as is noted above, was carried; the other amendment, however, was not passed. The House of Lords accepted the decision of the Commons and on the fifteenth of August "the bill for Amending the Representation of the People" received the royal assent.⁴

¹ A clause enacting that Parliament should not henceforth be dissolved on the demise of the Crown, was added by the Lords.

² Spencer Walpole in his History of Twenty-five Years, vol. ii, p. 193, discusses the origin of this phrase, showing that Cranborne had used it previously in 1867, and that Disraeli had used it in 1866. I find, however, the same expression used in Vivian Grey (London, 1881, original edition in 1826-27), p. 87: Grey makes a "leap in the dark" to save all.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxix, pp. 951-952.

⁴ The 30 and 31 Vict., c. 102.

At this point the reader who has followed the account of the passing of the Reform bill of 1867 may well ask the questions: "Whose bill, after all, is it?" "Does the credit for the measure belong to Gladstone as many have asserted; to Bright as many likewise have asserted; or to Disraeli?" "And whether or not it is the work of Disraeli, why did he and the Conservatives pass such a radical measure, or allow such a measure to pass?"

Was Gladstone the one who changed a measure which at its introduction was very conservative to a piece of radical legislation? Such, indeed, has been the assertion of many of his contemporaries and of many of the historians. Viscount Cranborne, one of the seceders from the Government, declared before the third reading, that the bill was the work of Gladstone:

My right honorable and gallant Friend near me (General Peel) said that this was a compound Bill, and that he did not know to whose authorship it was due. I cannot help thinking that if he had referred to the record I have just mentioned—if he had taken the original scheme of the Government, and had corrected it by the demands of the right honorable Gentleman, the Member for South Lancashire (Gladstone), he would have with tolerable exactness the Bill as it now stands. I mention this because I see with enormous astonishment that the passing of this Bill is spoken of as a Conservative triumph. Now, it is desirable that the paternity of all the strange objects that come into the world should be properly established; and I wish to know whether this Bill, as is generally supposed, is exclusively the offspring of the Government, or whether the right honorable Gentleman, the Member for South Lancashire, has not had something to do with it? If he has, it follows as an indisputable axiom that it cannot be a Conservative triumph. Now, I heard the demands which the right honorable Gentleman, the Member for South Lancashire, made on the second reading of the Bill. . . . They are ten in number:—First, he demand the lodger franchise. Well, the lodger franchise has been given. Secondly, and this is the only doubtful one, provisions to prevent traffic in votes. . . The right honorable Gentleman next demanded the abolition of obnoxious distinctions between compounders and non-compounders. Not only have those obnoxious distinctions been abolished, but all distinctions whatever have disappeared. The fourth demand of the right honorable Gentleman was that the taxing franchise should be omitted. It has been omitted. Fifthly, that the dual vote should be omitted. It has been omitted. Sixthly, that the re-distribution of seats must be considerably enlarged. It has been enlarged full fifty per cent. Seventhly, that the county franchise must be reduced. It has been reduced to something like the point at which it stood in the proposal of last year. Eighthly, that the voting papers must be omitted. To my extreme regret, the voting papers have been omitted. The last two demands were that the educational and savings banks' franchises should be omitted. These two franchises have been omitted. . . . No man in this House of Commons can remember a Government who have introduced a Bill of this importance, and who have yielded in Committee Amendments so vitally altering the whole constitution and principle of the Bill as has been done in the present instance.¹

Lord Elcho on the same evening decided to do as others had been doing—to devote some time “to personal explanations and to Parliamentary condolences and prophecies.” He as an Adullamite was not sorry that the question was being settled but he blamed Gladstone for sweeping away the securities.²

If we turn from the speeches of the members of Parliament to the writings of the historians of the period we again find it said that the bill was the work of Gladstone. Cox, in the Whig and Tory Administrations, writes:

¹ Hansard, vol. clxxxviii (July 15), pp. 1526-29.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxviii, pp. 1574-1576.

The allegation that the Reform Act of 1867 is mainly or substantially the work of the Conservative Government, is one of the most impudent falsifications of history that was ever attempted. Neither in form, nor in substance, does the statute actually passed agree with the measure introduced by Mr. Disraeli. The Act comprises sixty-one sections, and of them there are but four (1, 12, 49, 54) which are the work of the Conservative Ministry.¹

In The Reform Bills of 1866 and 1867, Cox states that Gladstone had early enumerated ten principal defects in the bill and that an amendment "for every one . . . except the second (which involved a proposal that occupiers of houses below some specified value should be excluded from the suffrage), has been carried out in the Reform Act now passed."²

Sir Spencer Walpole, in his History of Twenty-five Years, gives this conclusion :

The fact, however, is that, if the first edition of the Reform Bill of 1867 was the work of Lord Derby, Mr. Disraeli, and the Conservative Cabinet, the last edition of the measure was the work of Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone had, no doubt, many difficulties to encounter. His party was disorganised; he was himself regarded by some of his followers with distrust. And cave and tea-room formed convenient refuges for the discontented to frequent. Yet Mr. Gladstone, in this memorable Session, succeeded in making all the alterations in the Bill which he declared in the debate on the second reading to be necessary. And if, therefore, to Mr. Disraeli attaches the blame of surrendering, one after another, the securities and safeguards, on which he professed that he relied, to Mr. Gladstone belongs the credit of carrying the changes which he pronounced to be indispensable for the conversion of a bad Bill into a good one.¹

¹ Homersham Cox, Whig and Tory Administrations (London, 1868), p. 51.

² Cox, A History of the Reform Bills of 1866 and 1867, pp. 134-135.

In spite of the foregoing statements the person who follows the course of the Reform bill is apt to have a suspicion that credit for the bill does not belong to Gladstone. Whatever influence he may have had on some of the amendments, on the point of making the bill a democratic measure Gladstone was not the leader. Never in his life was he more surprised than when he found that Disraeli had accepted Hodgkinson's amendment to do away with the compound householder,² although he stood for that amendment himself, doubtless for political reasons. He did not want manhood or household suffrage but put forth a great struggle to get a £5 rating as the basis of the franchise. In a letter to William Horsfall on August 8, 1866, he wrote:³

Sir—In reply to your letter of the 6th, I beg respectfully to express my desire that my views respecting Reform in Parliament should be gathered from my own acts, and from my language, in which they have been amply stated. I do not agree in the demand either for manhood or for household suffrage; while I own with regret that the conduct of the opponents of the Government measure of this year has done much to encourage that demand, which, but for such opposition, would scarcely have been heard of. You are at liberty to make such use of this letter as you may think fit, and I remain, Sir, your very humble servant.—W. E. Gladstone.

And for his views⁴ toward the end of the session of the

¹ Walpole, History of Twenty-five Years, vol. ii, p. 196.

² Cf. supra, p. 210.

³ To be found in the Times, August 11, 1866.

⁴ In reply to a deputation of the National Reform Union Gladstone said that the House of Commons was inveigled and tripped into household suffrage when probably not twenty members were in favor of it. Cf. News of the World, May 19, 1867.

following year, the *Fortnightly Review*¹ asserted with a degree of certainty that he had not apparently swerved a hair's breadth from his last year's views when he never concealed his aversion to household suffrage as the basis of the franchise.

As a matter of fact, Gladstone's attitude toward the £5 rating caused him some unpopularity among members of the Reform League. At the meetings protests² were made against the half-way measure which the Liberals seemed apt to accept, and Gladstone himself was named³ by the London Working Men's Association as one who had attempted to draw an arbitrary line of rating below which householders should not be admitted to the franchise, and by a speaker⁴ at a Reform meeting as a member of the Manchester party who had been trying to do all he could to trip up the Government in order to make the bill less extensive. It seems to be a myth, then,—this tradition of Gladstone as the author of the Reform Bill of 1867.⁵

But what about John Bright and the bill? The North

¹ Fortnightly Review, vol. vii (June 1, 1867), pp. 755 and 756.

² Cf. meeting of February 27 (the Times, February 28), of March 6, of the London Working Men's Association at St. Martin's Hall (April 16), etc.

³ The Times, April 17, 1867.

⁴ Mr. Lucraft; vide the Times, July 4, 1867.

⁵ As a matter of fact, Gladstone himself, toward the middle of the session, gave the following opinion of his power, when he wrote in reply to Mr. Crawford, one of the members for the City, as to whether he intended to persevere in moving the different amendments on the Reform bill of which he had given notice: "The country can hardly fail now to be aware that those gentlemen of Liberal opinions whose convictions allow them to act unitedly upon this question, are not a majority, but a minority of the existing House of Commons, and that they have not the power they were supposed to possess of limiting or directing the action of the Administration, or of shaping the provisions of the Reform Bill." Cf. Annals of Our Time, April 18, 1867.

British Review, for instance, declared that the main outline and the chief provision of the scheme were clearly Mr. Bright's.¹ In the House of Commons Mr. Osborne² on the third reading said:

We have heard something tonight about the paternity of this Bill. There is no doubt who is its father. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is no doubt its putative father, but he is not the real father. This offspring is a stolen child; the right honorable Gentleman has stolen it, and then, as the School for Scandal has it, he has treated it as the gipsies do stolen children,—he has disfigured it to make it pass for his own. But the real author of this Bill is an honorable Gentleman who sits below me—the honorable Member for Birmingham. I have got a draught of his Bill of 1858, and in that Bill there is this mischievous proposal of household suffrage based upon rating. It is the honorable Gentleman who is the real father of it—he ought to be a right honorable Gentleman and be sitting cheek by jowl with the putative father of the Bill, and why he is not, I do not know. It is all very well to speak of this as a Conservative measure. Why, Sir, the hands that brought in the Bill are the hands of Lord Derby, but the voice was the voice of John Bright. Now, that must be a great consolation to all the Gentlemen on those Benches who for years have been denouncing the honorable Member for Birmingham, and accusing him of Americanizing our institutions—for “Americanizing” was the word. The right honorable Gentleman on the Treasury Bench and his Colleagues are Americanizers, for they share with the honorable Member for Birmingham in the merit of the measure; and the Conservative party are nothing more than votaries and supporters of the honorable Member for Birmingham.³

Trevelyan in his Life of John Bright points out that Bright

¹ North British Review, September, 1867, p. 223.

² An Independent Liberal.

³ Hansard, vol. clxxxviii, p. 1583.

in 1858 and 1859 made proposals which with very slight and quite immaterial changes, became the basis of the enfranchising act passed nine years later;¹ that in 1867 Bright sent Disraeli a memorandum suggesting the terms of the bill as passed;² that Bright himself declared he was becoming an authority with the Tory party.³

To the person who tries to sum up the importance of the various leaders in the Reform discussion, Bright, at least in one respect, does stand out as an important personage. He had great influence in keeping up the popular agitation. Friends and enemies alike acknowledged this.⁴ Now it was this popular agitation which caused the Conservatives to bring in a bill and apparently had somewhat to do with the terms of that bill. But when the reader goes through the account of the passing of the bill itself, he will note that Bright all too often kept to his leader Gladstone rather than to the other leading Radicals or to Disraeli. He spoke for the hard and fast line, not the £5 line of Gladstone, but one at £4 or £3, and even though, as Trevelyan says,⁵ he was the prime mover of the Hodgkinson amendment, he had no idea that it would pass. Bright followed Gladstone so closely as a matter of fact that he fell under the same popular disfavor at times as did Gladstone.⁶

And what can be said for Disraeli? His own account of the passage of the bill may be read in a speech delivered in Edinburgh at a banquet given in the Corn Exchange by twelve hundred of the leading members of the Conservative

¹ Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, p. 271.

² Ibid., pp. 371-372.

³ Ibid., p. 372, on the fourth of March.

⁴ Cf. the estimate of Bright's work in this respect in T. Wemyss Reid, Life of the Right Honorable W. E. Forster, vol. i, pp. 392-396.

⁵ Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, p. 376.

⁶ Vide supra, p. 124.

party in Scotland.¹—Having decided that the Conservatives had a right to deal with Reform and feeling that they ought to deal with it, he had for a considerable period endeavored continuously to lay down the principles upon which a measure of Parliamentary Reform ought to be founded. He and those of his opinions had to prepare the mind of the country—"to educate, if it be not arrogant to use such a phrase"—to educate his party on this subject of Reform. These were the points which he tried to impress upon the conscience and conviction of the country: first that the measure be a complete and comprehensive one, lest they be seduced into dealing with the question in detail. "And for this simple reason, that if you deal with it in detail you may indeed establish a democratic constitution."² In the second place, no proposal for grouping boroughs could be sanctioned,³ and in the third place, there should be a bona fide boundary commission.⁴ A fourth point was that added representation must be given to the counties, and a fifth was that the principle of rating should be the basis of the borough franchise. When there was a change of Government, the Conservatives had come into power. "We brought in a Reform Bill; we passed a Reform Bill; and now we ask you to consider, were the five points that during these seven years . . . I impressed upon Parliament and the country, were they obtained or not?" These points formed, of course, Disraeli indicates, the main outline of the bill as passed. He then goes on—

¹ The Chancellor of the Exchequer in Scotland, being Two Speeches Delivered by Him in the City of Edinburgh (Edinburgh and London, 1867).

² Ibid., pp. 11 and 12—i. e., Disraeli explains, the borough and county franchises and redistribution must be taken up together to keep "political equilibrium."

You must get a certain class of boroughs, by appealing to their patriotism, to spare you one of their members.

⁴ To see that borough occupiers should not become county electors, etc.

and then I am told, when measures recommended to the country during seven years have been so triumphantly carried into effect, that we have done nothing, that it is our opponents who have suggested the Bill. I can only say this, that if you had seen the countenance of the gentleman¹ who recently made a speech in this city when we did carry that Bill, you would not have read in those lineaments that triumph of the Liberal party after a toil of seventy years of which we have heard so much. I must say I never saw such a command over the exultation peculiar to man when he succeeds in an object dear to his heart and his friends.²

Monypenny and Buckle, too, contend that the bill was the work of Disraeli:

When Disraeli did finally acknowledge that decisive action was necessary, he was prompt, in conjunction with Derby, in sweeping aside temporary expedients, and founding himself upon an abiding principle. There is no evidence to show whether the definite acceptance of rating household suffrage is due rather to Disraeli or to Derby; both based themselves upon it in January, 1867. Both, too, cordially accepted the only method by which a settlement could be affected—the policy of welcoming, and deferring to, the co-operation of the House of Commons in the application of the principle adopted. But Derby was not so quick as Disraeli to see that the frank acceptance of this method could hardly fail to involve the disappearance of checks and securities to which he originally attached importance. The actual determination of what amendments should be accepted and what resisted necessarily devolved mainly on the leader of the House of Commons; and for the shape in which the Bill emerged from Committee—for the fact, indeed, that it emerged with safety at all—Disraeli was almost solely responsible.¹

¹ Reference to Mr. James Moncreiff (Liberal), member for Edinburgh.

² Much of interest is to be found in the remaining sections of this speech. Disraeli states that the Tories caused him to give up plural voting, the two-years residence clause, etc., and that when the Liberals asked that the compound householder be done away with, it was the very proposal he desired, to carry out his principle.

In fact the student who goes carefully over the history of the passing of the Reform bill of 1867 may be expected to agree with Derby who said ² that it was mainly due to Disraeli's tact, temper, and judgment, that the arduous undertaking in which they were engaged had not resulted, instead of a triumphant success, in disastrous failure. For although Disraeli consulted the House, apparently he kept the upper hand. With his principle ³ of personal rating ⁴ as against an artificial line he withstood the attacks of the Liberals. He accepted the Hodgkinson amendment and by his very acceptance led the Conservative party to accept it. This act of leading the Conservative party to household suffrage is remarkable, whether or not, as Cox suggests, Disraeli was forced to do so, when he came to realize that his principle as applied in the original intent would enfranchise communities in a most haphazard manner according to a very capricious distribution of the compound householding system.⁵ Here as at other times Disraeli with almost

¹ Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli, vol. iv, p. 562.

² Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 554.

³ Cox, A History of the Reform Bills of 1866 and 1867, pp. 122 et seq., points out that either test—the payment of rates, or the possession of houses of a particular value—is artificial. "Both criteria are imperfect, and only in rough imperfect ways serve to eliminate the drunkard, the spendthrift, the sluggard, the vagrant, and the profligate."

⁴ Ibid., pp. 169 et seq., Cox says: The principle of personal payment "is not in the Reform Act, it never had a place in any edition of the Reform Bill." Public Opinion, December 7, 1867, discusses legal decisions on payments of rates. Quoting the Manchester Examiner it states that "payment of rates by agent is for all intents and purposes the same as payment by the principal."

⁵ Ibid., pp. 197 et seq. Vide also Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 563, where is to be found an acknowledgement of this fact. Vide Cox's further statement (pp. 206 et seq.) on Disraeli's attempts to neutralize the effects of Hodgkinson's amendment.

superhuman cleverness, extricated himself easily from an embarrassing situation and made his blunders contribute to his success.¹ On the other hand those who like to find consistency in a man, may well point out that in the debates on the 1866 bill Disraeli had stood for lateral rather than vertical extension of the suffrage. With even greater effect can they point out that after the passage of the bill, Disraeli was not anxious to regard it as a democratic measure. He himself was unwilling to accept praise (or blame) for that which calls forth to-day our laudation. In the House of Commons he said:

There are 4,500,000 inhabited houses in England. I do not pretend to speak with severe statistical accuracy, but I think I do not make much of a mistake. Not more than a moiety of these, even if the Bill passes, will be inhabited by persons qualified to exercise the franchise. Then if household suffrage be democracy, what is this all about?²

In that speech at Edinburgh, already mentioned,³ he said:

. . . We have not established household suffrage in England. There are, I think I may say, probably four million houses in England. Under our ancient laws, and under the Act of Lord Grey, about a million of those householders possess the franchise. Under the new Act of 1867, something more than 500,000 will be added to that million. Well, then, I want to know if there are four million householders, and a million and a half in round numbers have the suffrage, how can household suffrage be said to be established in England?⁴ . . . Are we

¹ Cf. Westminster Review, July, 1867, p. 185.

² Hansard, vol. clxxxviii, p. 1113. This was as far along in the session as July 5.

³ Cf. supra, pp. 227-8.

⁴ The obvious answer is that Disraeli was clouding the issue by trying to prove that there was not household suffrage in England as a whole when no one would suggest that the measure was democratic except as it applied to the boroughs.

to be frightened at such a result as this? Are we really to believe that with a constituency of a million and a half—one million of whom we know of our own knowledge for a considerable space of time have exercised that suffrage according to the traditions of the country, and are now assisted in the fulfilment of that public duty by some half million more equally influenced by the traditions of the country—are we to believe that this is establishing a Democratic Government in England? If that can be maintained, even by an ex-Lord Advocate, I should look upon it as one of the most preposterous conclusions.¹

Of course we may question whether Disraeli actually meant what he said or whether he was trying to smooth matters for some of the less radical people with whom he was dealing. No definite answer can be given. Disraeli will always remain to us, at least in certain respects, as he was to John Bright, the mystery man.

To those who believe that credit for the bill belongs neither to Disraeli nor to Bright, there is a fourth assumption open: that it was nobody's bill; that public opinion as stirred up partly by economic and social conditions, partly by the Reform League, partly by John Bright, partly by trade unions, dictated that a liberal bill should be passed; that one section of the House was merely trying to outbid, for popular favor, the other, and thus it happened that a radical Hodgkinson amendment proposed by the Liberals for political reasons was accepted by the Conservatives for like reasons. Considerable arguments can be adduced for this belief.

Before the year was very far advanced the Times had admitted that the House of Commons would probably shelve the subject of Reform at once if members could have the needful protection, and were not bound as gentlemen to tell how they voted.¹ After the measure had passed the third reading, Lord Grey of the House of Lords said that it was an admitted fact that a majority of the members of the House of Commons really disapproved of the bill to which they had formally assented.² Earl Russell was rather afraid of the measure, especially, he said, because of a probable increase of corruption among the classes who really took no interest in politics.³ And Lord Derby, it will be remembered, in spite of his "greatest confidence in the sound sense" of his fellow countrymen, came out with the phrase: "No doubt we are making a great experiment and taking a leap in the dark."⁴

¹ The Chancellor of the Exchequer in Scotland, pp. 14 and 15; cf. also the Times, October 30, 1867.

Lord Shaftesbury, great friend of the workingmen as he was, spoke of the gross hypocrisy of the members of Parliament; "with the exception of a few advanced Democrats, they all detest and fear the measure."⁵ Carlyle in his "Shooting Niagara: And After?,"⁶ apropos of the Reform measure, declared—"Traitorous Politicians, grasping at votes, even votes from the rabble, have brought it on." The Quarterly Review before a bill was brought in, feared lest politicians, working upon the pledges which the lower ranks of the present constituencies had extorted from candidates, would create a fictitious political necessity to which the present organization of the House of Commons might induce the majority to submit, in spite of its convictions.⁷

¹ The Times, February 5, 1867 (mentioned supra, p. 122).

² Cf. Annual Register, 1867, p. 94.

³ Annual Register, 1867, p. 108.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxix, p. 952.

⁵ Edwin Hodder, The Life and Work of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, 3 vols. (London, 1888), vol. iii, p. 218.

⁶ To be found in Macmillan's, October, 1867.

⁷ Quarterly Review, January, 1866, p. 256.

Blackwood's, in June of 1867, spoke of the meetings which had gone on all over the country, and at which the language held was always the same—that nothing would content the people except registered manhood suffrage protected by the ballot—and declared that a House of Commons of which the majority should refuse to concede all that was now conceded, would find itself at daggers-drawn with the bulk of the people.¹ Disraeli himself, it is said,² heard the voice of the people and felt the force of the argument that “the pot was on the point of boiling over, and that those who kept it seething would get scalded for their pains.” In fact the Edinburgh Review states that in the great case of Mr. Hodgkinson's amendment Disraeli had made a concession to the popular stir threatening to grow into a tempest from without.³

It is probably true that this stir from without had its effect upon Disraeli and that he as the official who guided the bill through Parliament deserves approbation.

Disraeli deserves approbation provided, it may be suggested, he put through the bill not as a shrewd political act but on good faith that he was doing the country and the working class a benefit. Thus it brought up the much mooted question as to the reason for Disraeli's action. Did he play successfully the part of a Vivian Grey in shrewdly outmanœuvring his opponents on the political field or was he putting into effect some of his social theories as displayed in Sybil in the belief that social betterment for the working classes would come with the franchise? Or perhaps the real motive was a combination of these?

In the speech delivered at Edinburgh, Disraeli has given in general terms his view as to why the Conservatives dealt with the question: everybody must have felt it to be absolutely necessary for Lord Derby in 1866, to deal with this question. For fifteen years every prime minister and every party had dealt with Reform and had proved itself inadequate to the occasion. "And what is that but a premium to revolution?" Hence it was the duty of the Tories to try to deal with it. The failure of another Reform bill would have been a disadvantage to Lord Derby, he acknowledged, but more than that it would have been a source of great danger to the country.¹

¹ Blackwood's, June, 1867, p. 776.

² Vide Frazer's, November, 1867, p. 658.

³ Edinburgh Review, October, 1867, p. 572; at least he could say this to his followers.

So because of patriotic sentiments, because of the impelling force of popular opinion, Disraeli had been careful by various manipulations to pass the bill. But not every one living in 1867 and not every one of a later period has accepted this statement of affairs as given by Disraeli. And granting that the popular outcry did give Disraeli a leverage with which to move his party from the old position on such a question, and actually made the settlement of the question a necessity, one may yet declare that the motive of Disraeli was strictly political: that he desired to "dish" the Whigs. The Spectator for August 10, 1867, for instance, declared that Disraeli had admitted a party motive for the Reform bill by his statement that he had disturbed the Whigs' monopoly of Reform. The Edinburgh Review thought² the Conservative party willing to bear anything and to do anything in order to make itself politically powerful by passing the bill: "That (the Conservative) party, sore at its long exclusion, and determined to clutch the prize it had obtained, was in a humor to bear much. Unlimited abandonment of principles and policy on Reform, deceit in any quantity, vacillation without end—for these it was well prepared." Shaftesbury speaks of Disraeli and Gladstone as two tigers over a carcass—each for power and salary; and quotes Derby as telling his friends that if they passed his bill they would be in office for many years.¹

¹ The Chancellor of the Exchequer in Scotland, pp. 6 and 7.

² Edinburgh Review, October, 1867, p. 543.

But granting that political power was one of Disraeli's motives in passing the bill, that motive in him was no more unworthy than it was in Gladstone—the attacks of the Liberal papers and speakers notwithstanding. For the Liberals, says ² Blackwood's, had palpably used the question of a further Reform of Parliament for the last six or eight years as a measure of keeping themselves in office and for no other earthly purpose. "Parliamentary Reform must always be a popular cry; and nothing could be more easy than for the Whigs, driven from office or threatened with expulsion, to raise that cry, and convert it, if need were, into a stern reality."³ Lowering the franchise to £7 would help the Liberals, said the pamphleteer,⁴ as £10 did in 1832. "And then, when, under this new régime, the Conservative party had again succeeded in living down the obloquy which must necessarily attach to them with new electors admitted to the suffrage in spite of their opposition, the same game might be played once more, and a £5 suffrage be brought forward," etc. If this system could be followed and the Conservatives were inconsiderate enough to allow it, the Liberals might stay in power for the rest of their lives. If Disraeli thought such statements as these given above were facts, he can hardly be blamed for breaking the monopoly. If by granting the franchise to the ordinary

¹ Edwin Hodder, The Life and Work of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, vol. iii, pp. 217 and 218.

² Blackwood's, July, 1867, "The Progress of the Question," p. 113.

³ Ibid., December, 1866, p. 781.

⁴ H. W. Cole, The Middle Classes and the Borough Franchise (London, 1866), p. 26.

workingmen he could have their support to balance the support given the Liberals by the middle class and the élite of the working class, then might the Conservatives look for their share of the power of office. At least that was the opinion of many of the leading writers of the day. In the North British Review may be found a convenient summary of this view:

Mr. Disraeli believes that the lowest and most ignorant portion of the householders, both in town and country, are the most amenable to influence, the most likely to be managed and exploité by the Conservative party, most under the control of those above them, most dependent, both in circumstances and in mind, upon their employers, their landlords, their superiors. He thinks, too,—and to a great extent he is right,—that their native sympathies, and mental habits, and old prejudices, will dispose them to side with the Conservatives, with the old families, with “the land,” with the proprietors of great estates, and the inheritors of venerable names. . . . He knew that the élite of the artisan class, those intelligent and politically-interested workingmen, who lay immediately below the present electors, . . . were almost invariably Liberals and Radicals.¹

And Disraeli and the Conservatives must have been pleased in case this assumption is a correct one, by the reports of the growth of Conservative feeling as mentioned in the newspapers during the summer of 1867. The Times reported on the thirtieth of April the formation of a Conservative League to be called the Conservative Union and noted that in the last six months feeling for Disraeli's party had grown especially in the North where many Conservative organizations had sprung up.² On the first of May it reported two deputations to Disraeli, one of workingmen from ¹ North British Review, September, 1867, “The Achievements and the Moral of 1867,” pp. 211-212; also vide infra, p. 242.

² Cf. supra, p. 130, and also News of the World, May 5, 1867.

Norwich, the other of members of associations, who assured the Government that Conservative feeling was spreading throughout the country, that the workingmen of the North were prepared to support the Government, that the workingmen of Yorkshire had joined Conservative associations because they felt that the party was the true and only friend of the working classes. These and like reports at other times would lead the reader to think that Disraeli had a chance for success if he were really playing for the votes of the working class.

But was he not interested in the welfare of the lower classes? In the address to the workingmen of Edinburgh in October, 1867, he definitely made a statement of his interest. The country in general might well be congratulated, he said, that the bill the Government had introduced for the representation of the people in England had passed into law, and he was glad that the working classes of Edinburgh so entirely approved of it. Throwing his eye over a Parliamentary career that continuously had prevailed for upwards of thirty years, he could not find that he had ever taken any part hostile, or intentionally hostile, to the interests of the working classes, or that he had ever been connected with those who ought to be or who intended to be in antagonism with them. He continued:

Now, gentlemen, during those thirty years there has been a great mass of legislation which has been carried in Parliament affecting the interests of the working classes—measures in which they were deeply interested themselves, which they promoted by their presence, and which they showed by their conduct were dear in every sense to the innermost sentiments of their hearts and hearths. I have remarked, in looking over that period, that during that time, I think, if I recollect correctly—of course, upon an occasion like the present I must speak with that indulgence which I am sure you will afford to one who has no blue-books to refer to, but I think there have been thirty-two acts passed relative to the condition of the people, and especially of the working classes in this country, in which they took the deepest interest—laws affecting their wages, their education, their hours of toil, their means of self-improvement—laws the object of which was to elevate their condition and soften the asperities which are the inevitable consequence of probably any state of society that may exist. Now, Gentlemen, I can say this, it is some gratification to me, and I think it will be fairly admitted, it is some trial of the disposition and career of a public man, that of those thirty-two acts passed during those thirty years, I have invariably supported every one. Gentlemen, allow me to tell you that though that legislation is now considered as the result of a philosophy the propriety and justice of which cannot be questioned, there was not one of those acts that was not bitterly and ably opposed. I will not say now by whom they were opposed, or by what party they were opposed, because it is neither my wish, nor is it in any way necessary to a meeting like the present, that we dwell upon those circumstances. But this I will say, they were not opposed by the political party with which I am intimately connected. . . . Well, Gentlemen, on this subject I may be perhaps permitted to remind you that the present session of Parliament has given, I think, some evidence that the feelings of her Majesty's Ministers are unchanged upon this subject, and that we have not forgotten that which is one of the first and principal duties of any Minister, which is to consider whether, by legislation, the condition of the great body of the people can be improved.¹

Again, if reference is made to the early writings of Disraeli, there may be found at least quasi-democratic leanings. The welfare of the People is to him an important topic. That political advantages, however, may be had from care for the social welfare of the People is even more than suggested. He writes:

¹*The Chancellor of the Exchequer in Scotland*, p. 34.

Even now it [Toryism] is not dead, but sleepeth; and, in an age of political materialism, of confused purposes and perplexed intelligence, that 'aspires only to wealth because it has faith in no other accomplishment, as men rifle cargoes on the verge of shipwreck, toryism will yet rise from the tomb over which Bolingbroke shed his last tear, to bring back strength to the Crown, liberty to the subject, and to announce that power has only one duty: to secure the social welfare of the PEOPLE.¹

In another place he has Egremont's great speech in Parliament so interpreted:

"He spoke throughout in an exoteric vein," said the gray-headed gentleman, "and I apprehend was not very sure of his audience; but I took him to mean, indeed it was the gist of his speech, that if you wished for a time to retain your political power, you could only effect your purpose by securing for the people greater social felicity."²

Egremont's opinions are perhaps best stated in his discussion with Sybil:

"If there be a change," said Sybil, "it is because in some degree the People have learnt their strength."

"Ah! dismiss from your mind those fallacious fancies," said Egremont.

"The People are not strong; the People never can be strong. Their attempts at self-vindication will end only in their suffering and confusion. It is civilization that has effected, that is effecting, this change. It is that increased knowledge of themselves that teaches the educated their social duties. There is a dayspring in the history of this nation, which perhaps those only who are on the mountain tops can as yet recognize. You deem you are in darkness, and I see a dawn. The new generation of the aristocracy of England are not tyrants, not oppressors, Sybil, as you persist in believing. Their intelligence—better than that, their hearts—are open to the responsibility of their position. But the work that is before them is no holiday-work. It is not the fever of superficial impulse that can remove the deep-fixed barriers of centuries of ignorance and crime. Enough that their sympathies are awakened; time and thought will bring the rest. They are the natural leaders of the People, Sybil; believe me, they are the only ones.”¹

¹ Disraeli, Benjamin, Sybil or the Two Nations (London, 1845), p. 82.

² Ibid., p. 84.

It can be said that the People, as portrayed in Sybil, are not able, apparently, to carry on affairs successfully—the time for political democracy has not yet come—but by 1867 Disraeli definitely stated² that those called upon to exercise the franchise were sufficiently educated to fulfill that trust. It can be contended that Disraeli, the author of 1845, is not Disraeli, the statesman of 1867, but according to Shaftesbury Disraeli's interest in the welfare of the People had continued. The philanthropist wrote on August 9, 1866—“Have spoken to Disraeli, whom I found, as I always found him in the House of Commons, decided and true to the cause (of the working class).”³ At least it can be said for Disraeli that he knew of the condition of the working classes and had been interested in their welfare for a long period.

But, as the above-quoted passage from Sybil suggests, it seems that neither interest in the well-being of the working class, nor the political motive, taken alone, actuated Disraeli, but rather a combination of the two. Circumstances such as the revolt of Cranborne and the consequent dependence on Radical support⁴ and especially the already

¹ Disraeli, op. cit., p. 83.

² The Chancellor of the Exchequer in Scotland, “Speech in Answer to an Address Presented by the Working Men of Edinburgh,” p. 40.

³ Vide Hodder's Life of Shaftesbury, vol. iii, p. 214.

⁴ Cf. view of Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, p. 373, on this point.

emphasized discontent with economic conditions, undoubtedly did much to effect the passage of a democratic measure, yet Disraeli's writings clearly show that he was alive to the fact that it would be possible to make the working classes see the Conservatives as the champions who would gain for them social justice; by causing his party to give them social and political justice, he could bid, cleverly, for their political support.¹ At Edinburgh he declared to the workingmen:

You are indebted . . . to the party with which I am connected, who upon that occasion evinced a devotion and an energy rarely to be equalled in the history of the Constitution of our country. They gave no churlish support; they gave no limited devotion to their leaders; but impelled by the conviction that the settlement of this question was one of vital necessity, they determined that it should be settled in a manner which should produce concord among all classes of her Majesty's subjects.²

Elsewhere in his speeches he said: "I have from my very earliest public life been of opinion that this assumed and affected antagonism between the interests of what are called the Conservative classes and the laboring classes is utterly unfounded";³ and "When the people are led by their natural leaders, and when, by their united influence, the national institutions fulfil their original intention, the Tory party is triumphant."⁴ In fact, Disraeli's acts and his expression of opinions appeared to more than one writer as an attempt to get the support of the lower strata of workingmen. The Whigs had allied themselves with the middle classes for the benefit not only of the country but of themselves; the Conservatives might now ally themselves with

¹ Vide supra, p. 237, the North British Review.

² The Chancellor of the Exchequer in Scotland, p. 33.

³ Ibid., p. 35.

⁴ Ibid., p. 29.

part of the working class for the benefit not only of the country, and of the working class, but of themselves, said Blackwoods.¹ The Spectator was of the opinion that Disraeli believed as he believed when he wrote *Tancred*² that the uneducated people would always have a leaning in favor of Tory ideas.³ It liked to quote⁴ a part of his speech at Merchant Taylors' in June, 1867, where he said that he went to household suffrage because he believed that while the enfranchisement of the élite of the working classes alone would destroy his party, the enfranchisement of the residuum with the élite would renew its sources of strength.⁵ Frazer's poked fun at him for "his discovery that the lower you descend in the social scale, the better materials do you find for a sound, safe, and Conservative system of representation."⁶ Lord Shaftesbury denied the theory that though the middle classes were not Conservative, if you went deeper you could get into a vein of gold, and encounter the presence of a highly Conservative feeling.⁷ Other writers, however, assured their readers that the experience of English boroughs, as they were, demonstrated that when-

¹ Blackwood's, December, 1866, p. 781.

² Tancred, possessed of a religious theme, when taken with Coningsby and Sybil, will give some idea of Disraeli's religious, political and social opinions: an excellent chapter on Tancred is to be found in Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iii, chapter ii.

³ The Spectator, April 6, 1867.

⁴ Vide the Spectator, September 21, 1867, and September 28, 1867, p. 1076.

⁵ The Spectator does not give the exact words used by Disraeli; for his speech, vide the Times, June 12, 1867.

⁶ Frazer's, November, 1867, p. 661 et seq. One of its writers quoted the sentence: "the right honorable Gentleman is not the first great Hebrew legislator who has led his people into the wilderness, and what is more, he resembles Moses in this—he will never live to lead them out of it." Ibid., p. 668.

⁷ Vide Frazer's, November, 1867, p. 663.

ever the majority in the constituency consisted of workingmen, Tories were returned to Parliament; where the workingmen balanced other classes, and no more, Whigs were returned; wherever the working class happened to be in a minority, the boroughs returned Radicals. Blackwood's deduced from this even in January that a more liberal measure would probably be obtained from Lord Derby than any Lord Russell and Mr. Gladstone would venture to propose.

This idea of having a new kind of support for their party must have appealed to the Conservatives as a body. In 1865 their attitude toward Reform was thus put by the Quarterly Review: "During the last five years . . . they (Conservatives) have expressed themselves in opposition to all bare degradation of the suffrage, to all alterations in it that can in any degree increase the democratic element in the Constitution, with a frankness which leaves no room for misconstruction."¹ Later it said in reference to the Conservative attitude toward Reform before 1867: "Any one who cares to refer to 'Hansard' will find that the danger of lowering the franchise even to £6 or £7, because it would give to the working classes a preponderating power, was one on which the Conservative speakers constantly dwelt."² But by 1867 a change had come. Mr. Henley, who had long since³ declared in favor of household suffrage, was not now alone. "By little and little," says Blackwood's, "the truth has made its way into their (Tories') convictions that there is far more of sympathy between the workingmen and the aristocracy of England, than between either the aristocracy and what are called the middle classes, or the middle classes and the workingmen." ¹— It denied out and out that the Tories were "mortified" by the action taken by Disraeli. The party had indeed wisely followed its great leader: "In 1867 the party has not rebelled, indeed it has scarcely murmured; it has answered in divisions to the calls of its summoners with a discipline worthy of a more honorable campaign; and the malcontents, who may be counted on the fingers, have been voices crying in the wilderness." ² The malcontents had attacked Disraeli in the Quarterly Review,³ it is true, for passing a bill opposed to party principles but they were not representative of the party feeling.

¹ Quarterly Review, July, 1865, p. 293.

² Ibid., October, 1867, "The Conservative Surrender," p. 538.

³ The Spectator, June 29, 1867.

Disraeli had seen a great Reform bill through Parliament. The suggestive chapter title of Monypenny and Buckle—"Disraeli's Parliamentary Triumph"—does not seem to be unfitting, provided it is remembered that the Parliamentary Triumph to Disraeli probably meant more than mere Parliamentary triumph—it signified also an anticipated success for his attempt to lead the People to cherish the Conservative party and those great institutions which that party held to be most truly British.

¹ Blackwood's, July, 1867, p. 115.

² The Edinburgh Review, October, 1867, p. 542. The Tory dissenters in 1867, unlike the forty Adullamites of 1866, were unable to destroy party effectiveness.

³ Vide October, 1867, p. 547. Cranborne wrote for this magazine.

CHAPTER VI

CONCLUSION

WHAT would be the effect of Disraeli's "triumph" upon the political fortunes of the Conservative party? Would the People, as he hoped, affirm that the monopoly of Liberalism in Reform had been broken and would they now have confidence in the ability of Toryism to gain for them rights and privileges?

Disraeli had told a deputation in April, 1867, of his efforts for the People and of his expectations of their assistance:

The bill was the restoration of the old Constitution of this country, it gave back to the working classes those rights and privileges of which they were deprived by the bill of 1832 (loud cries of "Hear, hear"), and it sought to break down the barriers which separated the people from their natural leaders. . . . When you go back to your homes, tell your friends and neighbors that the hour may arrive, and that perhaps shortly, when we must count upon the energy and public spirit of the people (loud cheers). If the appeal is made, let it not be made in vain (it shall not be); and if it is successful you will do much more than support a ministry, you will save a country (enthusiastic cheering).¹

To the ministers, in a speech at the Mansion House banquet just before the close of the 1867 session, he declared that the Conservative party had "resumed its natural functions in the government of the country: "

¹ News of the World, April 14, 1867.

I have seen in my time several monopolies terminated, and recently I have seen the termination of the monopoly of Liberalism. Nor are we to be surprised when we see that certain persons who believed that they had an hereditary right, whenever it was necessary, to renovate the institutions of their country, should be somewhat displeased that any other persons should presume to interfere with those changes which, I hope in the spirit of true patriotism, they believed the requirements of the State rendered necessary. But I am sure that when the hubbub has subsided, when the shrieks and screams which were heard some time ago, and which have already subsided into sobs and sighs, shall be thoroughly appeased, nothing more terrible will be discovered to have occurred than that the Tory party has resumed its natural functions in the government of the country. For what is the Tory party unless it represents national feeling? If it does not represent national feeling Toryism is nothing. . . . The Tory party is nothing unless it represents and upholds the institutions of the country. . . . I cannot help believing that, because my Lord Derby and his colleagues have taken a happy opportunity to enlarge the privileges of the people of England, we have not done anything but strengthen the institutions of the country, the essence of whose force is that they represent the interests and guard the rights of the people.¹

Was Disraeli to have his hopes fulfilled? Had he really made the Conservative leaders the leaders of the people to such an extent that great political advantage would come to the Conservative party from the Act of 1867?

The answer to the questions was not to be clearly shown from the results of the next election—that of the autumn of 1868. The question at issue at that election was to be Irish disestablishment. Disraeli might well complain in his address to the electors of the county of Buckingham,² that although his party had settled the question of Parliamentary Reform, had carried on foreign affairs successfully, especially in the handling of Abyssinia,¹ and had strengthened the army and navy, etc., public verdict would not be given on such accomplishments but rather on a "proposal for the dissolution of the union between Church and State," brought forward by the Opposition.² Not the achievements of the past but the problems of the present and future were to receive the attention of the voters.

¹ Cf. Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, pp. 553 et seq., and the Spectator, August 10, 1867.

² In October, 1868.

The state of Ireland, was, indeed, the great question of the day. For "while Parliament did many things in 1868, it thought only of one thing: Ireland, always Ireland."³ Fenian activity in 1866 and 1867 causing a continuous suspension of the habeas corpus act in Ireland, Fenian attacks in England in 1867,⁴ had forced⁵ Irish affairs into prominence, and made them the paramount issue in domestic politics. In March, 1868, an Irish member moved that the House of Commons should resolve itself into a committee for considering the state of Ireland. He argued that England should either govern Ireland justly, or let her govern herself. On the question involved the Liberals once more became united. Gladstone, strongly supported by Lowe of ¹ British forces were sent into Abyssinia in the winter of 1867-68 to release British subjects held captive by the native ruler. The success of the expedition led Disraeli to declare that the standard of St. George had been hoisted on the mountains of Rasselas. For details on the Abyssinian War vide Walpole, History of Twenty-five Years, vol. ii, pp. 267-286.

² The Times, October 3, 1868.

³ Herbert Paul, A History of Modern England, vol. iii, p. 130.

⁴ For the attempt on Chester, vide Sidney Low and L. C. Sanders, The Political History of England (edited by William Hunt and R. L. Poole), vol. xii, p. 228; for the Manchester affair and the attempt on Clerkenwell jail, vide pp. 229-230.

⁵ Ibid., p. 219.

the Adullamites and Bright of the Radicals, declared that the Irish Church as an establishment must cease, and brought forward resolutions to that effect. The case had to be considered in committee, but when the motion to go into committee was put, Lord Stanley¹ of the Government proposed an amendment which would have left the question for the next House of Commons to consider. Many of the Conservatives, however, did not like Stanley's policy of delay; they stood for a policy of no surrender. Disraeli himself was not able to defend the Government in the manner expected of him by his followers² so that Lord Stanley's amendment was defeated by a majority of sixty, and the main question, that the House should resolve itself into a committee, was carried by a majority of fifty-six. And after the Easter recess, Gladstone's resolution—"That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property"—was passed. Yet Disraeli who since the retirement of Derby in February, 1868, had been the head of the Conservative party, did not resign or dissolve at once in spite of these defeats. His work with regard to Reform had not been completed. Bills dealing with Scotland and Ireland³ had not yet been passed and reports of boundary commissioners⁴ had not been considered. Had Parliament been dissolved, appeal must have been made to an obsolete constituency. Hence the appeal to the people had to be postponed for some time. Before an election was held, Gladstone continued to press his advantage by having the House pass other resolu-

¹ Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

² Walpole, History of Twenty-five Years, vol. ii, p. 327.

³ Cf. infra, pp. 258-60.

⁴ For the recommendations of the commissioners and the boundary bill (the 31 and 32 Vict., c. 46), vide Annual Register, 1868, pp. 30-37.

tions not favored by the Conservatives. The Lords, however, refused to follow his dictations. Thus stood affairs when Parliament was dissolved by proclamation on the eleventh of November, 1868. The country was asked to give its opinion upon the disestablishment and the disendowment of the Irish church.

Naturally, however, both sides tried to gain popular support, not only by the appeal to the Irish question but also by claims to the authorship of the Reform bill of 1867. Disraeli told his constituents at Buckinghamshire how the Conservatives had passed the bill.¹ Gladstone, on the other hand, in his address to the electors of South-West Lancashire, spoke of the bill "introduced by the Government, but amended and almost transformed by the Opposition."² At Liverpool he spent much time describing the part successfully played by the Liberals in Reform.³ And not only by the leaders but by speakers⁴ less noted, by magazines, by newspapers, the question was debated. Blackwood's had great hopes and anticipations that the newly-created voters would prove worthy of a boon which a Conservative Government had bestowed upon them. These newly-created voters owed all to the Conservatives:

And now, in order that the workingmen may be able to look after their own interests, the Tories have received them within the pale of the Constitution, to an extent which their rivals never dreamed of; and to which, when the Reform Bill of 1867 was brought forward, Mr. Gladstone and his friends offered all the opposition in their power.⁵

¹ Speech is to be found in the Times, November 20, 1868.

² Vide the Times, October 10, 1868.

³ Vide the Times, October 15, 1868.

⁴ Some speeches are given in Blackwood's, November, 1868, pp. 637 et seq.; vide also the Times.

⁵ Blackwood's, November, 1868, pp. 622 et seq.

To the Spectator, on the other hand, Mr. Gladstone might well claim confidence by what he had done to secure for the nation at large a wide and substantial representation in the new Parliament:

It was in that cause (i. e., Reform) that he sacrificed office, and the country now knows that it was really that sacrifice of office which secured reform. . . . It was Mr. Gladstone who, amidst a storm of disapproval from Conservative Liberals and Liberal Conservatives, no less than the Tories, threw over the "wise" Palmerstonian policy of "Rest and be thankful," and insisted on redeeming the repeatedly broken promises of Reform. It was Mr. Gladstone who roused the enthusiasm of the working classes by asserting, in reply to the scornful taunts of the superfine Conservatives, that the working classes are "our own flesh and blood," and have a right to expect trust rather than dread. It was Mr. Gladstone, who, after parrying the unwearied thrusts of the Opposition for months, at last saw that he would do more for Reform by resignation than by perseverance in a measure so ruthlessly contested in every detail. It was Mr. Gladstone who obliged the Tory Ministry to abandon every one of their reactionary proposals, and to widen their mock reform into a real (one) by conceding nine out of the ten conditions which he dictated. . . . Mr. Gladstone said in April, 1866, "We stand or fall by this Bill, as has been declared by my noble friend; we stand with it now; we may fall with it a short time hence; and if we do, we shall rise with it hereafter." To the spirit, if not to the letter, that prophecy is about to be fulfilled. The new Constituencies are about to mark whom they regard as the true author of the great reform by using their new privileges for the very first time to realize that "hereafter". What Mr. Disraeli resisted vehemently and even manfully in 1866, what he conceded contrary to his declared principles under compulsion and with mischievous qualifications in 1867, the people cannot profess to thank him for, with full hearts or true confidence in 1868.¹

¹ The Spectator, October 17, 1868, p. 1209.

The election was favorable to the Liberals. Gladstone's party won in Scotland, Ireland and in the boroughs of South Britain.¹ In the English counties the Conservatives were successful. They also could point out that Lancashire went for them² even to the extent of rejecting Gladstone himself,³ and comfort themselves with the phrase—"What Lancashire thinks to-day, all England thinks tomorrow."⁴ Another statement which solaced them was the announcement that only one hundred and forty Tory members had been returned after 1832 as compared with about two hundred and seventy-five after 1867. Many of their members, too, represented the most powerful constituencies of the kingdom and not the small boroughs.⁵ The wisdom of Derby and Disraeli had been established, it was said, for had the Liberals passed a £7 bill, the Conservative party would have been routed as it was routed after 1832. Blackwood's appeared to be quite cheerful over the situation:

There can be no doubt that the extension of the franchise has invigorated Conservatism. The Tory party has voluntarily widened its borders, and the experience of the elections demonstrates, as its leaders had believed, that it flourishes most vigorously when "broad-based upon the people's will." . . . Two hundred and seventy-six Tory Gentlemen have been returned to Parliament by the English democracy. . . . All men can see

¹ The Spectator, December 5, 1868, p. 1421, gives data.

² Blackwood's, January, 1869, p. 119; the Spectator, November 21, 1868, p. 1361—quotes as causes that either the majority of the new voters were generally Conservative, or they were specially anti-Catholic and anti-Irish, or they were not free voters at all, but under the influence of their employers.

³ The Spectator, November 28, p. 1392, gives reasons for this.

⁴ Cf. Blackwood's, January, 1869, p. 130.

⁵ Conservatives said that the Liberals had won through small boroughs. Vide refutation of the Times, December 1, 1868 (quoting Liverpool Albion).

that the Tory party is still intact; but we are convinced that an examination of the electoral returns will show that it is at the present moment substantially more powerful than it has been at any time since 1846.¹

The Liberals on their part could point out that they had a majority of over a hundred.² Some of their organs were unable to resist the temptation to twit opponents:

This at least, it should seem, is clear, that as far as electioneering results go, the course which Mr. Disraeli has taken is as damaging to the Conservatives as any course could possibly have been. The majority is enormous in mere numbers, exceeding anything in recent history except that of the Parliament which met after the first Reform Act. This is hard enough, considering the kind of promises by which the poor squires were induced to follow their leaders. Lord Derby laid it down that the great object of his Reform policy was "to take such measures as should turn his minority into a majority." Mr. Disraeli told them that he had resisted the line of £7, and accepted household suffrage, "because that measure would not injure the Conservative party." By promises such as these, scattered still more lavishly in private, the Conservative members, up to their ears in anti-democratic pledges, voted enthusiastically for the platform of the most extreme Reformers in the House. The "dodge" has ridiculously failed. . . . To a sacrifice of reputation, or a forgetfulness of scruple, a portion at least of the Conservative party might possibly have been reconciled, if it would have enabled them to "dish the Whigs." But to have gone through all this dirt in order to make their political condition exactly twice as bad as it was before must be irritating. . . . To have changed a majority of sixty into a majority of a hundred; to have changed their opponents from a rabble into a disciplined host; and to have made the Liberals into Radicals, is about the net result to the Conservatives of the Conservative strategy of 1867.¹

¹ Blackwood's, January, 1869, pp. 112 and 113.

² In the Journal of the Statistical Society of London, vol. xxxii, pp. 102-113, is to be found collected from the newspapers of the two leading political parties (Daily News and Standard) facts relating to the general election of 1868. The editor considered it desirable to preserve these statements, as exhibiting the manner in which the same class of facts was regarded by contemporaries of opposite politics.

As a matter of fact, Disraeli thought it best to resign at once. He had believed that the country would not sanction the disestablishment of the Church, and had advised an appeal to the new constituencies.² The appeal had not been successful. Gladstone, with the prospect of a general election, says Keibel,³ had played the trump card (i. e., Irish Church Resolution). He knew well enough, the writer continues,⁴ that a ministerial majority would have been returned, had the appeal to the people been on the merits of the Reform bill of 1867. It must be confessed, however, that Gladstone's attack on the Irish Church does not appear to a writer like Mr. Trevelyan as the attempt of a politician to catch votes.⁵ To him it seems that the Liberal leader could not even be sure that the question would not finally and definitely break up a party already split into many sections.

Yet if the result of the election of 1868 was not the result hoped for by Disraeli, his idea of establishing the Conservative party on a national and popular basis, was destined to be successful, to a degree at least, in the long run. One authority has pointed out how events have largely justified Disraeli's policy:

¹ Saturday Review, November 28, 1868, pp. 702-703.

² Vide the Spectator, December 5, 1868.

³ Keibel, Lord Beaconsfield and Other Tory Memories, p. 41.

⁴ Ibid.

⁵ Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, p. 388.

The constituency which the Reform Act of 1867 created, and which was logically completed by the extension of household franchise to the counties in 1884, gave the Conservative party, either alone or in alliance with the Unionist Liberals, majorities at four General Elections—1874, 1886, 1895, and 1900; insuring a fair spell of power to Disraeli himself, and a much longer tenure, by one of the caprices of fortune, to the statesman who worked his hardest against Disraeli to prevent that constituency from coming into being—Lord Salisbury. The existence, in considerable numbers, of the Conservative working man, whom it was the fashion of the Liberals of the 'sixties to treat as a myth, has been shown over and over again by the immense polls cast for the party in the largest urban constituencies.¹

Also Mr. Charles Seymour points out ² that if the elections from 1867 to 1884 are taken as a whole, the effect of the bill of 1867 in so far as it altered the strength of parties was beneficial to the Conservatives. Their gain was most marked in the counties where the new voters became their enthusiastic supporters. In the agricultural divisions they took seventy-seven per cent of the county seats after 1867 in contrast to sixty-seven per cent carried before the passage of the Reform bill. It had been supposed, however, that those newly enfranchised would vote much as the £50 tenants had voted in this type of division. Much more striking was their gain in the industrial counties where the Liberals, owing to the numerical superiority of the urban elements over the tenant farmers, had been accustomed to a slight majority of seats. But the £12 electors, perhaps feeling that the Liberals were no longer bent on middle-class legislation, gave to the Conservatives sixty-six per cent of the seats in such divisions.

¹ Monypenny and Buckle, vol. iv, p. 564.

² Charles Seymour, Electoral Reform in England and Wales (New Haven, 1915), pp. 300-310.

In the boroughs the relative strength of the parties was not changed by the Act of 1867: the Liberals still carried as before, about sixty per cent of the seats. An analysis of the effect of the Act upon different types of boroughs, Mr. Seymour remarks, is a difficult task inasmuch as classification into types is quite artificial and, at times, almost impossible owing to the effect of corruption, the influence of the "tradition or sentiment of the community" and the activity of the controlling landlord who unlike the county landlord might belong to either party. But in the metropolis and in that type of borough which may be designated as the smaller centers of industry the Conservatives made important gains. In the metropolis they carried thirty-four per cent of the seats following 1867 in contrast to five per cent after 1832, and in important industrial towns they took over thirty-four per cent of the seats after 1867 in contrast to twenty-five per cent after 1832. It appeared that Disraeli had not appealed in vain to the working class. However, the Conservatives made no gain and even suffered losses in other types of boroughs. In the very great industrial towns the Liberals held their own. In fifty or more of the smallest boroughs they proved themselves to be as strong as formerly. They gained slightly in the boroughs of moderate size—the cathedral cities and county towns—and to a greater degree in the boroughs having a population from ten to twenty thousand¹ and in the boroughs of such territorial extent that they represented interests of a rural and agricultural character.²

The redistribution bill which was quite limited in charac-

¹ Mr. Seymour thinks that the Liberals may have been influenced to retain boroughs of this type in the redistribution of 1885 because of their value to the Liberal cause. Vide Electoral Reform in England and Wales, p. 308.

² The results of the elections in this type of borough would lead the Liberals to be willing to try the household franchise in the counties.

ter, favored the Conservatives very slightly, if, indeed, it may be said to have changed the relative strength of the parties at all.¹ Hence the Act of 1867 in its total effect considerably strengthened the Conservative cause chiefly by the gain of county seats. Moreover, it became clear as election succeeded election "that the Conservatives might without discouragement look to the workmen in the industrial towns, and that the Liberals had nothing to hope from the yeomen farmers."²

Thus far the result of the passing of the 1867 Act upon the fortunes of the Conservative party has been the chief matter of consideration. What, on the other hand,—it may be asked—was the result of the passage of that Act upon the position of workingmen in the state? So numerous, indeed, were the new householders that the working class was in a clear majority. A return of 1869 shows that especially in the large industrial towns the electors entitled to vote as householders far outnumbered the electors entitled to vote as £10 occupiers.³ Birmingham with 42,880 as the total number of electors on the register had 35,172 electors entitled to vote as householders and 7,708 electors entitled to vote as £10 occupiers; Blackburn with a total of 9,712 electors on the register had 7,764 householders and 1,948 £10 occupiers; Bolton with a total of 12,745 had 9,880 householders and 2,861 £10 occupiers; Manchester with a total of 48,256 had 22,897 householders and 25,331 £10 occupiers; Leeds had 37,470 householders and 9,443 £10 occupiers; Preston, 11,021 and 2,442, and Sheffield, 19,928 and 10,027. On the other hand, the new electors in the metropolis where the lodger franchise was not as effective as its supporters had supposed it would be, were represented by a gain of only sixty-six per cent, in Liverpool by a gain of less than ninety per cent and in some of the smaller boroughs by a very slight increase.¹ Moreover, the proportion of electors to population in the boroughs became equalized so that no longer did the manufacturing towns have the low ratio of voters which prevailed before 1867.²

¹ Vide Seymour, pp. 344 and 345.

² Ibid., p. 310.

³ Accounts and Papers, 1868-1869, 1 (419), 109.

But the second Reform Act in spite of those democratic tendencies displayed by the strengthening of the position of the workingmen in the boroughs of England and Wales left problems to democratic advance in the future. Very pressing was the question of Parliamentary Reform for Scotland and Ireland. Effective changes in electoral registration, the curbing of bribery at elections, a radical redistribution of seats, the introduction of a democratic suffrage in the counties, were tasks to be completed before England could be said to be truly democratic.

Reform measures for Scotland and Ireland were soon taken up. A Reform bill for Scotland was introduced in 1867, but, for want of time, was postponed until the following year when a measure was introduced by the Lord Advocate for Scotland. This measure as it concerned the franchise was based on the English act.³ In the boroughs the franchise was to be extended to all householders rated and paying rates; in the counties there was to be an ownership franchise of £5 clear annual value, and an occupation franchise of £12.⁴ According to the distribution clauses seven new members were to be given to Scotland, which would be an addition to the aggregate numbers of the House. It

¹ Seymour, pp. 281-283.

² For data, vide Seymour, pp. 289 et seq.

³ A clear account is to be found in the Annual Register, 1868, pp. 18-24.

⁴ Later fixed at £14.

was in this last point that the Government again found itself defeated. Many were the protests against adding to the number of members of the House. When the measure was taken up in committee a motion was made "That it be an instruction to the committee that, instead of adding to the numbers of the house, they have power to disfranchise boroughs in England having by the census returns of 1861 less than 5000 inhabitants." Disraeli, retaining his opinions that the best way to give the entitled additional representation was by increasing the number of members of the House, finally spoke in favor of an alternate motion, that instead of disfranchising boroughs, the committee have instructions to take one member from each of those boroughs in England which in 1861 had less than 12,000 inhabitants. But in spite of Disraeli the first motion was carried and the Government had to accept the situation. On one other important amendment the Government was defeated: this was a motion proposing to get rid altogether of the rate-paying qualification in Scotland by omitting the words making the payment of rates a necessary condition of the franchise.¹ When the defeat came, Disraeli asked for time to consider the future course of the Government, but finally accepted this amendment also. With some minor changes the bill became law.²

Less difficulty was met in the Irish Reform bill.³ It was proposed with regard to Ireland to make no change in the occupation franchise in counties which had been fixed at £12 but to reduce the borough franchise from £8 to £4 and

¹ But subsequently the committee agreed that no man should be entitled to be registered as a voter, "Who shall have been exempted from assessment or payment of poor rates on the ground of inability to pay . . . or who shall have failed to pay . . . all poor rates (if any) that have become payable by him." Cf. Hansard, vol. cxcii, p. 842.

² As the 31 and 32 Vict., c. 48.

³ For an account of this, vide Annual Register, 1868, pp. 24-30.

to extend the lodger franchise to Ireland on the same conditions as to England. Inasmuch as the landlord was to pay the poor rates of all houses below £4, only those rated for the poor as in England, would obtain the franchise. A redistribution scheme proposed met with so little favor on either side of the House, that Disraeli withdrew that part of the measure. And, although the bill was passed¹ without causing the ministry the embarrassment met with during the passing of the Reform bill for Scotland, much dissatisfaction was expressed. It was declared that the Irish people would refuse to accept this as anything like an adequate measure of Reform for Ireland; that the borough franchise was fixed at an unfair figure; that the county franchise was not reduced below the figure at which it was placed eighteen years ago and was in effect the equivalent of a £30 county rating in England; and that by the bill only 9000 would be added to the total number of voters in Ireland, whereas if the English system were acted on in respect to Ireland some 20,000 ought to be added to the Irish constituencies.

Another question connected with Parliamentary representation and needing change was the registration system. The Act of 1867 made an already complex system of registration still more complex: the new franchises added to those previously in effect, caused more labor for the overseers who made up the lists of voters, and the abolition of composition and the requirement of "personal payment" of rates led to confusion and dissatisfaction. Under the old system many landlords had included the rate in the rent. Now the occupiers had to pay the rates themselves in addition to the rent which the landlord did not lower. A "fine" had been imposed after all by the franchise as had been predicted by certain members of Parliament during the debates on Reform. The situation became such that Lord Henley declared to Parliament that "the feeling among the small occupiers in the towns where the change from compounding to non-compounding was made was one of the most serious dissatisfaction."¹ The Conservatives who had debated for "personal payment" of rates did nothing notwithstanding the unpopularity of the requirement, but the Liberals in 1869 passed legislation for composition.² The compound occupiers, however, were to have their names on the electoral lists.

¹The 31 and 32 Vict., c. 49.

Other forces causing disfranchisement had operated before 1867 and still persisted, as Mr. Seymour points out.³ The overseers because of ignorance, carelessness, inefficiency or political bias drew up unsatisfactory lists. Double entries sometimes created fagot votes in the counties. More often complaint was made that the registration system disqualified. For instance, red tape made the lodger franchise almost entirely ineffective.⁴ Objections by the wholesale, moreover, were made by election managers to the qualifications of those electors of opposing party creed. The protested voters were often unwilling or unable to sustain their votes by appearing in the revision courts with the result that the active and unscrupulous manager might get rid of a hostile plurality. The lawyer of the party association was often in a position to uphold an elector's claim but would be fairly sure to reap the benefit of the vote for his party.⁵

¹ Hansard, vol. cxc, p. 438.

² 32 and 33 Vict., c. 41.

³ Seymour, chapter xii, gives a clear account of the various restrictions which the system of registration put upon the franchise.

⁴ Special claims had to be made in the revising courts which were open only in the daytime.

⁵ If the objection proved to be frivolous or vexatious the claimant might get costs according to an existing law. The law was not very effective, however.

To do away with these and similar abuses a committee was appointed in 1868 to investigate registration conditions. Their suggestions, embodied in a bill introduced in 1871, met with opposition to change, which was too strong to permit any but slight reform until 1878. The Act of 1878¹ concerned with boroughs and the Act of 1885² dealing with the counties attempted to make the preliminary lists free from errors. The relieving officials of the poor, the registrars of births and deaths were to give necessary data to the overseers. The latter officials were to enter the names of compound householders in the rate book and thence place them on the electoral register; the red tape involved in the lodger's franchise was modified and a curb was put on the system of wholesale objections. Although not radical the legislation helped to make the system work fairly smoothly after 1885.³

Corrupt practices did more to hinder democratic advance than did the abuses of the registration system just mentioned. An attempt made to deal with the situation in 1854, had not been really effective. It was felt that even with the greater number of electors after 1867 bribery would continue as a problem. To overcome existing abuses a tribunal more free from party spirit than the committee chosen by lot in the House of Commons would be needed to test the validity of elections, some method of combating intimidation in elections must be found, and direct bribery must be strictly dealt with by law. Acts of 1868, 1872, and 1883 accomplished such results that political democracy was greatly advanced. By the act of 1868⁴ judges selected

¹ 41 and 42 Vict., c. 26.

² 48 and 49 Vict., c. 15.

³ For defects of the system, vide Seymour, pp. 381 and 382.

⁴ 31 and 32 Vict., c. 125.

from the judges of superior courts were to try the petitions alleging that elections were void because of the misconduct of the successful candidates. They were to decide on the facts and on the law and had the power to report on the prevalence of bribery in the inculpatcd constituencies. In contrast to the committees of the House of Commons the judges performed their duties so impartially that charges of party bias have been made infrequently and the reform has been spoken of as a noteworthy landmark in political history.¹ By passing the Ballot Act of 1872² Parliament granted one of the requirements made by the speakers of the Reform League in 1866 and 1867. It was pointed out that intimidation of the working class in their exercise of the franchise could best be coped with through the adoption of secret voting. The Liberal Government showed itself in favor of the change in the method of conducting elections in 1870, had a bill passed through the Commons in 1871,³ and finally was able to enact the measure in 1872. The Act did protect the elector from intimidation.⁴ But bribery was still practiced even when it could not be known whether the bribed voter had fulfilled his bargain. Moreover, general entertainments and picnics, general treating at public houses, payment of traveling expenses, as practiced by the parties in the 'seventies and early 'eighties, may be called indirect bribery. Such forms of bribery because of their effectiveness were sure to continue so long as election expenses were not more carefully checked up. The measure passed to curb the abuses—the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Preven-

¹ Spencer Walpole, The History of Twenty-five Years, vol. ii, p. 204.

² 35 and 36 Vict., c. 33.

³ The bill was sent to the Lords so late in the session that they refused to consider it.

⁴ Sir Thomas Erskine May and Francis Holland, The Constitutional History of England, 3 vols. (London, 1912), vol. iii, pp. 26 and 27.

tion Act ¹—limited, therefore, the expenses of elections and the use to which money might be put.² The candidate was not to have personal expenses amounting to more than £100. The returning officers were allowed maximums fixed according to the size of constituencies. Voters might no longer be brought to the polls in hired vehicles. One authorized agent and no paid canvassers were permitted to the candidate. Treating, defined as the giving, or paying the expense of giving, any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision with the object of corruptly influencing voters, was forbidden to all. Undue influence, defined as the making use or threatening to make use, of any force, violence, or restraint, or inflicting, or threatening to inflict any temporal or spiritual injury to any person in order to influence his vote, was likewise an offence. Corrupt practices were punishable by imprisonment with hard labor or by a fine of £200. A candidate found to have been knowingly guilty of breaking any of the regulations was to be excluded from representing the constituency forever and from sitting in Parliament for seven years. That the Act was successful in controlling expenses is seen from the fact that the election by 3,000,000 electors in 1880 cost £3,000,000 whereas the election by 5,670,000 electors in 1885 cost but £780,000.³ But seats were still so costly as to limit the choice of candidates. Although the various acts against corrupt practices did not entirely stop bribery, complaints after the year 1883 were comparatively rare.

The question of further extension of the suffrage in counties and of radical redistribution was brought forward soon after 1867. The Act of that year was not regarded as having the mark of finality. In one sense the measure was undemocratic: it actually increased the difference between the proportion of electors in counties and boroughs. When it is considered that after 1867 only one man in fourteen was an elector in the counties in contrast to one man in seven in the boroughs,¹ that the voting increase as a result of the second Reform Act was only forty per cent in the counties in contrast to one hundred and forty-five per cent in the boroughs and that the boroughs had one and a half as many electors as the counties in spite of a population smaller by two millions,² that the property qualification dating to 1430 was the most important franchise in the counties, claim might well be made that the miners and the artisans and small tradesmen of the towns not to mention the agricultural laborers were being unjustly discriminated against simply because they lived on the wrong side of an imaginary line. Hence Mr. Trevelyan³ in 1872, 1873 and 1874 brought before the House of Commons either by resolution or bill his opinion that the "householders outside the boundary of Parliamentary boroughs" should be in possession of the franchise. But the Liberals thought that the time had hardly come for a new extension of the suffrage, and Disraeli as Prime Minister in 1874 was opposed to extension without a large measure of redistribution. In 1875 Lord Hartington of the Opposition also pointed out that serious anomalies would be created by any new bill unless redistribution were included in the measure.

¹ 46 and 47 Vict., c. 51.

² May and Holland, vol. iii, pp. 32 and 33.

³ May and Holland, vol. iii, p. 33.

In fact, redistribution measures in 1867 and 1868 had been slight in character. Agricultural counties still upheld the power of the landowners as formerly. Slight gains had been made by the manufacturing groups of the Midlands and Northwest, it is true, but even with this gain the manufacturing county divisions as against the agricultural divisions were represented, in proportion to their population, by far too few members. The proportion of seats to population in the South-Midlands was two and a half that of the Northwest.¹ And with the growth of the industrial divisions after 1868 the anomalies became more striking. Should 1,000,000 new voters be created, Disraeli declared, there would be necessity for a large measure of redistribution and a system of equal electoral districts.

¹ Before 1867 the proportion had been one man in twenty-one an elector in the counties and one in sixteen in the boroughs. Vide Seymour, p. 287.

² Ibid., p. 295.

³ George Otto Trevelyan was a Liberal.

Mr. Trevelyan in 1876 and 1877 tried, therefore, to meet objections by introducing resolutions in favor of redistribution. But the Prime Minister contended that the increase in the number of voters in the counties would call for such redistribution as to cause the dissolution of the existing borough constituency and the destruction of the variety of character derived by the House from the municipal communities.² Hence the resolutions were defeated in 1876 and 1877.

In the meantime, the public was showing interest in the question of Reform. The Reform League which had gone out of existence in 1869 was revived in 1876. John Bright spoke at great public meetings and Gladstone wrote in favor of a further extension of the suffrage. Yet nothing was accomplished before the Liberal victory in the general election of 1880. By 1884 Gladstone was ready to deal with the franchise. The bill which he championed gave to the rural classes such privileges of voting as were enjoyed by the workingmen in the boroughs.¹ Extension to the counties of household and lodger franchises which had prevailed in the boroughs since 1867 and a service franchise for those who occupied houses or separate rooms by virtue of their employment, caused an increase of two million to the number of electors of the United Kingdom. The Liberals acknowledged the necessity of a redistribution scheme but did not plan to present it until the following year. It was to this arrangement² that the Conservatives gave opposition, as they had done in 1866. After some difficulty the bill passed the House of Commons only to be rejected by the House of Lords. Conservatives, feeling that in case of a dissolution before redistribution, Radical influence would become paramount and would dictate such a redistribution bill that the Conservative party would long be out of control and landed interests would suffer, demanded a complete bill. The ministers did not give way, agricultural laborers paraded for their rights, and threats of ending or mending the House of Lords began to be heard. That body, it was supposed, was using its demands as a means to escape from passing the bill. Compromises, however, soon were mentioned, and the passage of the bill became assured when the leaders, brought together in private conferences partly through the influence of the Queen, made an agreement as to the coming redistribution. The redistribution bill soon followed. Boroughs having a population less than 15,000 were merged in the counties and boroughs under 50,000 which had been returning two members now were allowed one.

¹ Seymour, pp. 345 and 346.

² May and Holland, vol. iii, p. 30.

¹ Vide Paul, op. cit., vol. iv, pp. 326-336.

² Also to the inclusion of Ireland in the scheme, where the electorate was increased from 200,000 to 700,000 voters. It was said that forty per cent of the new electors were illiterate and would be a power for Parnell.

Of the seats liberated for distribution in England and Wales almost an equal number was given to the counties and the boroughs. Boroughs and county members now represented approximately the same population and in counties, at least, the ratio of seats to population was for the most part, constant.¹ Industrial county divisions and manufacturing towns of the North had been granted their full proportion of representatives and the Southwest had lost, therefore, a considerable number of seats. It was determined that single-member districts should be made in the new constituencies and in the larger towns so that minorities which were majorities in certain sections might obtain representation. For the purpose of giving additional representation to Scotland twelve more members were added to the House. Thus by 1885 England was approaching² manhood suffrage, although not until 1918 was there further lowering of qualifications and the granting of woman suffrage.

But did the fact that the workingman had obtained the franchise really make better his position in the state? Did all those reforms which the Reform speakers were wont to talk about, come as expected, with the vote? As a matter of fact, the welfare of the workingman did not immediately occupy the attention of the parties after 1867, to the extent predicted; nor did the workingmen themselves have much success in obtaining representation in the House. Indeed, they did not put forth much effort, at least, in the beginning, to return members of their class; they voted, some of the papers proudly proclaimed, like good Englishmen. The Spectator was one paper, however, which preached against this lack of representation of the working classes, for nowhere in 1868 were workmen returned and in scarcely a borough could they be said to have selected separately the representative. Not until 1874 did trade union leaders try a general campaign for direct representation in Parliament.¹ And although even then no success resulted when Labor candidates ran without support from the other parties, aid from the official Liberals enabled Mr. Alexander Macdonald and Mr. Thomas Burt, the two chief officials of the National Union of Miners, to enter Parliament as the first Labor members.

¹ For anomalies in the representation of boroughs vide Seymour, pp. 515 et seq.

² Bachelors living with parents, domestic servants, and those who did not meet residence qualifications were excluded.

Of course something was done for the workingman, the historian can point out. Even in 1867² Lord Elcho had succeeded in carrying through the Master and Servant Act.³ The condition existing previously, namely, that a workman in case of breach of contract, could be arrested on warrant and imprisoned, subjected to hard labor by the justice, while the employer could be attacked only by civil action, had been much complained of and was now remedied by the law which put both employer and employee on the same level by making it possible to summon either for breach of contract before the magistrates who might fine or order the contracts to be fulfilled. Leaders of the trade unions had agitated for an amended law since 1863 and with the passage of the measure of 1867 not only "won the first positive success of the trade unions in the legislative field" but "did much to increase their confidence in Parliamentary agitation."⁴

In the same year was passed the Factory Acts Extension

¹ Slater, The Making of Modern England, p. 210.

² The bill received the royal assent on August 20, 1867; a select committee had been appointed for inquiry in 1866.

³ The 30 and 31 Vict., c. 141.

⁴ Sidney and Beatrice Webb, The History of Trade Unionism, p. 236.

Act ¹ whereby the restrictions on the employment of women and children in dangerous trades were extended and the powers of inspectors increased, and also the Workshop Regulation Act ² applicable to an establishment in which fewer than fifty persons were employed in any manufacturing process, except those already included under factory acts. This Act defined "employed" as work in any handicraft, whether for wages or not, under a master or under a parent and hence was supposed to control home-workers.³ A law which limited hours of work but gave no fixed times was easily evaded and often proved, of course, a dead letter.

There was the Factory Act ⁴ of 1874 whereby the hours of labor for women and children were still further reduced, i. e., to a maximum of fifty-six and one half a week. The men who would find their day's work completed when the machinery was shut down with the departure of the women and children, had hoped for a fifty-four hour week from the Conservatives whom they had helped to elect in 1874.⁵ The new Government, reputed, at the time, to be more favorably inclined than the Liberals toward labor, nevertheless disappointed trade union demands by effecting but slight improvement on existing conditions.⁶ There was the Employers' Liability Bill ⁷ of 1880 which met in part a grievance often protested against by the trade union world. Since 1837 the courts had decided that although an employer ¹The 30 and 31 Vict., c. 103. Disraeli spoke of this in one of the Edinburgh speeches, as an instance of interest on the part of the Government in the welfare of the working class.

²30 and 31 Vict., c. 146.

³Hutchins and Harrison, A History of Factory Legislation, p. 171.

⁴37 and 38 Vict., c. 44.

⁵*Cf.* Hutchins and Harrison, p. 175.

⁶For the Consolidation and Amendment Bill of 1878 vide Hutchins and Harrison, pp. 176 et seq.

⁷43 and 44 Vict., c. 42.

was liable to a member of the public for the result of his workmen's negligence he was liable to those in his employ only for the result of negligence on his own part, and not for the result of negligence on the part of one employee to a worker in common employment. Injured persons living near a mine might get damages from the mine owner in case of an explosion due to the carelessness of a miner; fellow miners could not bring suit for damages on account of the doctrine of common employment.¹ The influence of great employers in both the Conservative and the Liberal parties prevented an abolition of this doctrine of common employment but it could not prevent the Act of 1880 which made the employer liable to his workingmen for negligence on the part of superintendents or foremen "to whose orders the workmen were bound to conform." There was the Artisans' Dwellings Act ² of 1875 which, intended to be the cause of better dwellings for the working classes, was never of great effect.

The passage of the Education Bill ³ of 1870, too, met the oft-voiced demands of the workingmen. Mr. Forster was chiefly responsible for this Act by the terms of which the supply of efficient elementary schools was to become adequate for needs in all sections of the country. It was felt that the Act of 1867 by entrusting to the urban workingmen the responsibilities of citizenship had made it necessary that illiteracy as a peril to a democratic state should be removed. Mr. Lowe had correctly forecast the future legislation in 1867 when he declared to the House of Commons: "I believe it will be absolutely necessary that you should prevail on our future masters to learn their letters."⁴

¹ Paul, op. cit., vol. iv, p. 153.

² 38 and 39 Vict., c. 36.

³ 33 and 34 Vict., c. 75.

⁴ Hansard, vol. clxxxviii, p. 1549.

In 1871, moreover, the Government found itself forced to legislate on the subject of trade unions.¹ The influence of trade unions had assisted, it has been seen, in accomplishing the passage of the Representation of the People bill in 1867. Nevertheless, the leaders of the societies had little feeling of security in 1867. Because of outrages, especially at Sheffield, the public viewed the movement with the eyes of a Charles Reade; and in a case involving the funds of the Boiler-makers' society, the Court of Queen's Bench declared that trade unions were illegal associations. Hence they could not seek legal protection for their accumulated funds. In the early part of 1867 the leaders convened a "Conference of Amalgamated Trades." It was little more than a meeting of the "Junta," the informal cabinet of five trade union leaders living in London,² and a few friends. Assisted by Mr. Tom Hughes in Parliament and by the writers, Professor Beesly and Mr. Frederic Harrison, out of doors, it tried to obtain a legal status for the societies. The majority report of a royal commission appointed to inquire into the whole subject of trade unionism, was not hostile, while a minority report advocated the removal of all special legislation relating to labor contracts and contended that no act by a combination of men should be regarded as criminal if it would not have been criminal in a single person. Mr. Harrison was anxious to bring the trade unions under existing acts for the protection of their funds against fraud or theft but to have them retain a legal privilege of being incapable of being sued or otherwise proceeded against as a corporate entity. A bill embodying such proposals was introduced in the first Parliament elected after the passage of the Reform Act of 1867. The Liberal Government was against it but demonstrations by the workingmen led to the promise that the cabinet would soon bring in a bill of its own. Accordingly in 1871 legislation¹ was passed, providing that no trade union was to be illegal inereely because it was in restraint of trade, but an important additional bill² provided that any violence, threat or molestation for the purpose of coercing either employer or employed should be severely punished. The terms used in this latter bill were not defined, and the trade unionists knew that no effective policy could be carried out under such a law. Their protests, however, were without result—until the elections of 1874 when the Liberals found themselves out of power. Conservatives alive to the political influence of the unions repealed the Criminal Law Amendment Act in 1875 and passed a new bill expressly permitting peaceful picketing.³ Moreover, by replacing the Master and Servant Act of 1867 by an Employers and Workmen Act,⁴ master and servant became, as employer and employee, two equal parties to a civil contract and imprisonment for breach of engagement was abolished. Trade union demands were completely satisfied.

¹*Vide Webb, History of Trade Unionism*, chap. v.

²The men in this group were William Allan and Robert Applegarth, the general secretaries of the two amalgamated societies of Engineers and Carpenters, Daniel Guile, general secretary of the national society of Ironfounders, Edwin Coulson, general secretary of the "London Order" of Bricklayers, and George Odger—the Reform speaker—a member of the union of makers of ladies' shoes.

But for some time after the passage of the Reform bill of 1867 the workingmen followed the two great parties too closely to obtain great and important results for themselves. Trade unionism after its triumph in 1875 passed through financial trials during the trade depression of following years until by 1879 its total membership had decreased to that of the year 1871. And, as a result of the laissez faire

¹ The 34 and 35 Vict., c. 31.

² The 34 and 35 Vict., c. 32.

³ The 38 and 39 Vict., c. 86.

⁴ The 38 and 39 Vict., c. 90.

political and social creed of the leaders, the trade union world failed to exercise any effective influence upon Parliament between 1876 and 1885.¹ Hence the bill of 1867 did not bear its chief fruits until many years later. Distrust of the promises of the Liberals and the Conservatives, however, was to be seen at times, and among the workingmen and their leaders there cropped up occasionally the idea that real emancipation of labor would come only through their banding together, through strikes, and perhaps through a complete international social revolution, rather than through the promised, though too often deferred, activity of any of the political parties. That politics did count, however, was to be shown in a quarter of a century by the formation and activity of the Labor party. That party formed from the union of a Social Democratic party founded in the early 'eighties on the Marxian gospel, a Fabian Society founded shortly afterward with the idea of educating the public in Socialism, and an Independent Labor party founded in the early 'nineties on Socialistic principles but acknowledging the need of occasional compromise, was brought into being in 1901 as a result of the Taff Vale decision by the House of Lords. By that decision trade unions were held responsible for damages done by individual members. Labor interests, therefore, called for defense; hence the Labor party. The Labor party was fortunate, too, in finding the Liberals willing to work with it. The Liberals, influenced by the writings of Henry George, by the Fabians, and perhaps even more by the actual facts concerning the physical condition of the English workingman as brought out by the examination of Boer War recruits, decided that something must be done for the lower classes. The opening years of the twentieth century, therefore, witnessed a great amount of social legislation in Great Britain. The people were using their democratic representative mastery over government as a means through which to undertake general social control.¹ The Reform Bill of 1867 had borne its fruit. Demands of the Reform speakers of 1867 were being realized; socialization of politics had come. And, to the student of to-day it seems unlikely that the Workmen's Compensation Act² of 1906, the provisions for Child Welfare³ in 1908, for the Old Age Pensions⁴ in 1908, the work for the unemployed and the Labor Exchange⁵ Act of 1909, the Measure⁶ of 1909 dealing with sweated labor, as well as Great Britain's imperialistic policy, would have been viewed⁷ with displeasure by the author of Sybil. Further reforms of the franchise have advanced democracy; and although political leaders had but little opportunity to attempt a remedy for social sores during the course of the Great War, it is safe to predict that, with the coming of peace and the triumph of democracy's cause, England's statesmen and England's Government will give more time and more attention than ever before to the demands and needs of the workingman.

¹ Webb. History of Trade Unionism, p. 356.

¹ Cf. Carlton Hayes, British Social Politics (Boston, 1913), pp. 2 and 3.

² The 6 Edw. VII, c. 58.

³ The 8 Edw. VII, c. 67.

⁴ The 8 Edw. VII, c. 40.

⁵ The 9 Edw. VII, c. 7.

⁶ The 9 Edw. VII, c. 22.

⁷ It is easy to imagine, on the other hand, what would have been Disraeli's attitude on the curbing of the Lords.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Adams, Charles Francis, Charles Francis Adams. Boston and New York, 1900.
- Annuaire des Deux Mondes*.
- Annual Register*.
- Anstey, Thomas Chisholm, Notes upon the Representation of the People Act, 1867. London, 1867.
- Argyll, Duke of (George Douglas Campbell), Autobiography and Memoirs, edited by the Dowager Duchess of Argyll. 2 vols. New York, 1906.
- Arnold, R. Arthur, The History of the Cotton Famine from the Fall of Sumter to the Passing of the Public Works Act. New edition. London, 1865.
- Ashwell, Arthur Rawson, Life of the Right Reverend Samuel Wilberforce. 3 vols. London, 1880-82.
- Bagehot, Walter, Essays on Parliamentary Reform. London, 1883.
- Bassett, Arthur Tinley, Gladstone's Speeches. Descriptive Index and Bibliography. London, 1916.
- Baxter, Robert, The Panic of 1866 with its Lessons on the Currency Act. London, 1866.
- Baxter, R. Dudley, National Income. London, 1868.
- , The New Reform Bill. London, 1866.
- , The Taxation of the United Kingdom. London, 1869.
- Blackie, John Stuart, On Government. Edinburgh, 1867.
- Blanc, Louis, Letters on England. Translated from the French by James Hutton and revised by the author. 2 vols. London, 1866.
- , Lettres sur l'Angleterre. Deuxième Série. Paris, 1866.
- Bowley, A. L., A Short Account of England's Foreign Trade in the Nineteenth Century. Revised edition. London, 1905.
- , Wages in the United Kingdom in the Nineteenth Century. Cambridge, 1900.
- Brassey, Thomas B., On Work and Wages. 3rd edition. London, 1872.
- Bright, John, The Public Letters of John Bright. Collected and edited by H. J. Leech. London, 1885.
- , Speeches on the American Question. Boston, 1865.
- , Speeches on Parliamentary Reform. London, 1866.
- , Speeches on Questions of Public Policy. Edited by James E. Thorold Rogers. London, 1868.

- Brodrick, G. C., The Utilitarian Argument against Reform as Stated by Mr. Lowe. London, 1867.
- Bryce, James, The Historical Aspect of Democracy. London, 1867.
- , Studies in Contemporary Biography. London, 1903.
- Buxton, Sydney, Finance and Politics; an Historical Study 1783-1885. 2 vols. London, 1888.
- Carlyle, Thomas, Shooting Niagara: And After? London, 1867.
- Chesterton, G. K., The Victorian Age in Literature. London, 1913.
- Cole, H. W., The Middle Classes and the Borough Franchise. London, 1866.
- Cooper, Thomas. Life, Written by Himself. 2nd edition. London, 1872.
- Cox, Homersham, A History of the Reform Bills of 1866 and 1867. London, 1868.
- , Whig and Tory Administrations. London, 1868.
- Cracroft, Bernard, The Analysis of the House of Commons, or Indirect Representation. London, 1867.
- Dickinson, G. Lowes, The Development of Parliament during the Nineteenth Century. London, 1895.
- Dictionary of National Biography*.
- Disraeli, Benjamin, The Chancellor of the Exchequer in Scotland, being Two Speeches delivered by Him in the City of Edinburgh. Edinburgh and London, 1867.
- , Sybil or the Two Nations. London, 1845.
- , Vivian Grey. London, 1881. Original edition 1826-1827.
- , Whigs and Whiggism. Political Writings. London, 1913.
- Dover, Richard. Progress versus Collapse. Westminster, 1869.
- Dunning, William Archibald, The British Empire and the United States. New York, 1914.
- Fawcett, Henry, The Economic Position of the British Labourer. Cambridge and London, 1865.
- Fox, Wilson, Report on the Wages and Earnings of Agricultural Labourers with Statistical Tables and Charts. London, 1900.
- Fraser, Sir William, Disraeli and his Day. 2nd edition. London, 1891.
- Frost, Thomas, Forty Years' Recollections. London, 1880.
- Giffin, Sir Robert, Essays in Finance. 2nd series. New York, 1886.
- Gladstone, W. E., Gleanings of Past Years. 7 vols. London, 1879.
- Green, Willoughby, Workingmen and Their Wages. Leeds, 1869.
- Hansard*.
- Hardy, Gathorne, A Memoir. 2 vols. London, 1910.
- Hare, Thomas, Memorandum on the History, Working, and Results of Cumulative Voting. London, 1871.
- , A Treatise on the Election of Representatives, Parliamentary and Municipal. 3rd edition. London, 1865.
- Harris, William, History of the Radical Party in Parliament. London, 1885.

- Harrison, Frederic, Foreign Policy. London, 1867.
- Hayes, Carlton J. H., British Social Politics. Boston, 1913.
- , A Political and Social History of Modern Europe. 2 vols. New York, 1917.
- Heaton, William, The Three Reforms of Parliament. London, 1885.
- Hickson, W. E., Tracts for Inquirers. London, 1867.
- Hill, Frederic, Parliamentary Reform. London, 1865.
- Hodder, Edwin, The Life and Work of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury. 3 vols. London, 1888.
- Holland, Bernard, The Life of Spencer Compton, Eighth Duke of Devonshire. 2 vols. London, 1911.
- Holt, Winifred, A Beacon for the Blind Being a Life of Henry Fawcett the Blind Postmaster General. Boston, 1914.
- Holyoake, George Jacob, Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life. 4th edition. 2 vols. London, 1900.
- Hunt, William, and Poole, Reginald L., The Political History of England. 12 vols. London, 1906.
- Hutchins, B. L., and Harrison, A., A History of Factory Legislation. 2nd edition revised. London, 1911.
- Hutton, R. H., The Political Character of the Working Class. London, 1867.
- Hyndman, H. M., Commercial Crises of the Nineteenth Century. London, 1892.
- Irving, Joseph, The Annals of Our Time. London, 1875.
- Jones, Ernest, Democracy Vindicated. Edinburgh, 1867.
- Kebbel, T. E., Lord Beaconsfield and other Tory Memories. New York, 1907.
- Kent, C. B. R., The English Radicals. London, 1899.
- Kinnear, John Boyd, Redistribution of Seats. London, 1867.
- L., Queries on the Franchise. Norwich, 1866.
- Lang, Andrew, Life, Letters, and Diaries of Sir Stafford Northcote. New edition. Edinburgh and London, 1891.
- Lecky, William E. H., Democracy and Liberty. 2 vols. New York and London, 1896.
- Levi, Leone, The History of British Commerce and of the Economic Progress of the British Nation 1763-1878. 2nd edition. London, 1880.
- , Wages and Earnings of the Working Classes. London, 1867.
- Lowell, A. Lawrence, The Government of England. New edition. 2 vols. New York, 1917.
- Ludlow, J. M., and Jones, Lloyd, The Progress of the Working Classes. London, 1867.
- Lushington, Godfrey, Workmen and Trade Unions. London, 1867.
- McCarthy, Justin, A History of Our Own Times. 2 vols. New York, 1880.

- MacDonald, William, The Government of Maine. New York and London, 1902.
- Mackey, Thomas, History of the English Poor Law. London, 1899.
- Malmesbury, James Howard Harris, Memoirs of an Ex-Minister; an Autobiography. 2 vols. London, 1884.
- May, Sir Thomas Erskine, and Holland, Francis, Constitutional History of England. 3 vols. London, 1912.
- Mill, John Stuart, Autobiography. 3rd edition. New York, 1874.
- Molesworth, W. N., History of the Reform Question from 1832 to 1866. Fortnightly Review, vol. vii.
- Monypenny, William F., and Buckle, George E., The Life of Benjamin Disraeli. 4 vols. New York, 1910-16.
- Morley, John, The Life of William Ewart Gladstone. 3 vols. London, 1903.
- Mulhall, M. G., The Dictionary of Statistics. London, 1899.
- Murchison, J. H., The Conservatives and "Liberals," Their Principles and Policy. 2nd edition. London, 1866.
- Murdock, James, A History of Constitutional Reform in Great Britain and Ireland. Glasgow, 1885.
- Nadaud, M., Histoire des Classes Ouvrières en Angleterre. Paris, 1872.
- Noble, John, Free Trade, Reciprocity and the Revivers. London, 1867.
- O'Brien, R. Barry, John Bright; a Monograph. London, 1910.
- Ostrogorski, M., Democracy and the Organization of Political Parties. Translated from the French by Frederick Clarke. 2 vols. New York, 1902.
- Palmer, Roundell, Memorials. 4 vols. London, 1896-1898.
- Parliamentary Reports, Accounts and Papers*.
- Parker, Charles Stuart, Popular Education. London, 1867.
- Paul, Herbert, A History of Modern England. 5 vols. New York, 1904.
- Periodicals:
- Athenaeum*.
- Beehive*.
- Blackwood's*.
- British Workman*.
- Contemporary Review*.
- Dublin Review*.
- Economic Review*.
- Economist*.
- Edinburgh Review*.
- Era*.
- Fortnightly Review*.
- Frazer's*.
- Home and Foreign Review*.
- Illustrated London News*.

- Journal of the Statistical Society of London.*
London Review.
Macmillan's.
National Review.
News of the World.
Nineteenth Century.
North British Review.
Public Opinion.
Punch.
Quarterly Review.
Revue des Deux Mondes.
Saturday Review.
Spectator.
Times.
Westminster Review.
- Political Euclid, The Reform Problem. London, 1866.
- Porter, G. R., The Progress of the Nation. Revised by F. W. Hirst.
London, 1912.
- The Public General Statutes.*
- Rathbone, William, The Rock Ahead. A few Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform. Edinburgh and London, 1867.
- , Soundings in Political Waters; an Inquiry into the Principles of Parliamentary Representation. Edinburgh, 1867.
- Reade, Charles, Put Yourself in His Place. New York, 1870. Originally published in the Cornhill Magazine, 1869-70.
- Reid, Stuart J., Memoirs of Sir Wemyss Reid. London, 1905.
- Reid, T. Wemyss, Life of the Right Honorable W. E. Forster. 2nd edition. 2 vols. London, 1888.
- Representative Reform. Report of the Committee appointed by the Conference of Members of the Reform League, and Others, on Mr. Hare's Scheme of Representation.* London, 1868.
- Rhodes, J. F., History of the United States. 8 vols. New York, 1900-1919.
- Rogers, James E. Thorold, Bribery. London, 1867.
- Rose, J. H., The Rise of Democracy. London, 1897.
- Russell (1st Earl), John, Essay on the History of the English Government and Constitution. New edition. London, 1866.
- , Recollections and Suggestions. London, 1875.
- Rutson, A. O., Opportunities and Shortcomings of Government in England. London, 1867.
- Sauntsbury, George, The Earl of Derby. New York, 1892.
- Scrope, G. Poulett, No Vote, No Rate. London, 1867.
- Seymour, Charles, Electoral Reform in England and Wales. New Haven, 1915.

- Seymour, Charles, and Frary, Donald Paige, How the World Votes. 2 vols. Springfield, Mass., 1918.
- Slater, Gilbert, The Making of Modern England. New revised edition. Boston, 1915.
- Slosson, Preston W., The Decline of the Chartist Movement. New York, 1916.
- Smith, George Barnett, The Life and Speeches of the Right Honorable John Bright. 2 vols. London, 1885.
- Smith, Goldwin, The Experience of the American Commonwealth. London, 1867.
- Stanley, W. F., Proposition for a New Reform Bill. London, 1867.
- Stephen, Sir Leslie, Life of Henry Fawcett. 2nd edition. London, 1885.
- , The "Times" on the American War. In Magazine of History, vol. x.
- Sybel, Heinrich von, Die Begründung des Deutschen Reiches durch Wilhelm I. 7 vols. Munich, 1890-94. There exists a translation into English by M. L. Perris and G. Bradford.
- Taylor, F. Isabel, A Bibliography of Unemployment and the Unemployed. London, 1909.
- Townsend, Meredith, The Poor. London, 1867.
- Toynbee, A., Lectures on the Industrial Revolution. 3rd impression. London, 1913.
- Traill, H. D., Social England. 6 vols. London, 1897.
- Trevelyan, George Macaulay, The Life of John Bright. London, 1913.
- Walpole, Sir Spencer, History of Twenty-five Years. 4 vols. London, 1904-08.
- , Life of Lord John Russell. 2nd edition. 2 vols. London, 1889.
- Ward, Robert, Thoughts on the Reform Question, and Proposals for its Solution. Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1867.
- Wason, Rigby, The Currency Question. London, 1869.
- Webb, Sidney, and Beatrice, Industrial Democracy. London, 1902.
- , The History of Trade Unionism. New edition. London, 1911.
- White, William Hale, An Argument for an Extension of the Franchise. London, 1866.
- Wood, George H., The History of Wages in the Cotton Trade during the Past Hundred Years. London, 1910.
- Wright, Thomas, Some Habits and Customs of the Working Classes. London, 1867.

INDEX

- Aberdeen, Lord, 26
 Adams, C. F., 40, 44
 Adullamites, 96, 97, 100-1, 111-2, 131, 138, 147, 149, 152, 160, 162-3, 174, 184-5, 187, 199, 217, 222
 Agriculture, from 1841-61, 14; in early '30s, 20, 22; in '50s, 23; in early '60s, 51, 88, in 1865, 52; in 1866-7, 57-8, 67, 79
 Amalgamated Engineers, 116*n*, 183
 America and the English Reform movement, 33, 38-50, 133, 161, 164, 169-70, 182, 190, 226
 Baines, E., 91, 178, 183, 214
 Ballot, secret, 214-5, 263
 Beales, Edmund, 89, 101-7, 111-2, 120-1, 129
Beehive, 83*n*, 84, 113*n*
 Beesly, E. S., 33, 49, 83*n*, 99, 272
 Bismarck, 31-2, 112, 133
 Blanc, Louis, 29, 34, 42, 44-5
 Bribery, 110, 142, 155-6, 163, 168, 181, 186, 202, 222, 233, 256, 262-4
 Bright, John, 19, 27-8, 30, 32, 38-41, 43, 49, 89, 92, 94-5, 97, 101, 106-111, 113-5, 117, 121, 123-4, 131-4, 138, 145, 146, 148, 150, 155, 158-9, 172-3, 179, 181, 196, 197-8, 202-4, 208-10, 215, 218, 220-1, 225-7, 232, 249, 266
 Bulwer-Lytton, Sir E., 167-168
 Cairns, Sir Hugh, 156, 163
 Carlton Club, 197
 Carlyle, T., 233
 Carnarvon, Earl of, 189, 194, 197, 199, 200
 Cattle plague, 56, 64-5, 131
 Cavour, 33
 Chartists, 19, 21-5, 214
 Cholera, 65, 76-7, 79
 Cobbett, William, 20
 Cobden, R., 41, 43, 46-7, 89, 138, 182
 Commerce, 14, 24, 51-2, 58, 62-3, 166, 168
 283]
- Commercial crisis of 1825, 59; of 1864, 55; of 1866, 59-62, 64, 76, 78-81, 83-4, 130, 133, 157, 192
 Compound householder, 128-9, 142, 201, 205-7, 209-12, 224, 229*n*, 230, 262
 Corn Laws, 20-1, 22*n*, 138, 152, 188
 Cotton famine, 44, 53-6, 183
 Cotton trade, 43, 52-3, 55, 63, 68, 70, 79
 Cranborne, Viscount (Robert Cecil), 42, 148, 161, 188, 191, 194, 197, 199, 200, 202, 208, 211, 217, 221-2, 241, 255
 Derby, Earl of, 27, 34, 37, 88, 101, 121, 176, 187-9, 191-2, 194, 197-9, 205, 219-20, 223, 226, 229, 230, 233, 235-6, 244, 247, 249, 252-3
 Dickson, Colonel, 32*n*, 112, 128
 Disraeli, B., 20, 27, 34, 36-7, 40-1, 123, 125, 128*n*, 129-30, 134, 151, 153-5, 157, 174, 184, 188, 189-205, 207-215, 218, 220-1, 223-4, 226-32, 234-47, 249-56, 259-60, 265-6, 275
 Distress effective for Reform, 49, 51, 65, 71-2, 80-6, 133
 Dunkellin, Lord, 159, 185-6, 200
 Education, 99, 109, 132, 168, 175, 177, 181, 217, 271
 Elcho, Lord, 116, 150, 163, 217, 222, 269
 Election of 1865, 91-2; of 1868, 247, 252-4
 Emerson, R. W., 98, 103*n*
 Emigration, 23, 166, 175
 Factory acts after 1832, 19; after 1867, 269-71
 Fawcett, Henry, 34, 146, 181, 213
 Fenians, 65, 113, 134, 248
 Forster, W. E., 41-4, 47, 49, 89, 93, 95, 109, 121, 133, 140, 149, 210-1, 271
 France and the English Reform movement, 29-31, 32-33, 112, 190
 283

- Franchise, defects of, after 1832, 17-8
 Free trade, 21, 22*n*, 51, 81, 169
 Garibaldi, 33, 35-7
 Germany and the English Reform movement, 31-3, 112, 133
 Giffen, Sir Robert, 79-80
 Gladstone, W. E., 35, 37-8, 40, 48-9, 92-3, 95-7, 101-2, 106-8, 111, 113, 123-4, 127, 136-44, 148, 151, 153-5, 157-9, 172-3, 175-6, 180, 185-6, 191-2, 196, 198, 201-12, 214-5, 218-25, 227, 236, 244, 248, 249-52, 254, 266
 Gold, discovery of, 23-4, 166
 Goschen, G. J., 93, 140, 153, 175, 182
 Grosvenor, Earl, 127, 148, 151, 157
 Hardy, Gathorne, 189, 203, 211
 Hare, Thomas, 216
 Harrison, Frederic, 83*n*, 100, 272
 Henley, J. W., 28*n*, 118, 197, 211, 244
 Hodgkinson, G., 210, 212, 224, 227, 230, 232, 234
 Horsman, E., 91, 116, 145-7, 164
 Housing conditions, complaints of, 131-2, 177
 Hughes, Thomas, 93, 272
 Hume, Joseph, 21
 Hyde Park incident, 102-5, 111-2, 116, 118, 121, 133, 190-2
 Ireland, 15, 65, 112, 116, 125, 141, 153, 178, 247-50, 252, 254, 259-60
 Iron industry, 64, 73, 79, 81
 Italy and the English Reform movement, 33-8, 49, 112, 133
 King, Locke, 27*n*, 87, 212
 Labor party, 274
 Laing, S., 16, 144-5, 147, 164, 196, 213-4
 Lancashire operatives, 44, 47, 54-6, 73, 183
 Layard, A. H., 150, 181
 Levi, Leone, 68, 69*n*
 Lincoln, 147*n*
 London Working Men's Association, 111, 125, 127, 206, 225
 Lowe, Robert, 96, 100-1, 112, 116, 133, 138, 145-7, 151-3, 155-7, 162-3, 166, 168-9, 172, 195, 211, 215, 217, 248, 271
 Lucraft, B., 101-2, 124, 225*n*
 Maine Liquor Law, 169-70
 Malthus, 98
 Manufactures, 14, 22-4, 42-3, 52-3, 63-4
 Master and Servant Act, 99, 131, 177, 269, 273
 Mill, J. S., 106-8, 113, 156, 183-4, 209, 214, 216*n*
 Mining industry, 14, 61
 Minorities, representation of, 156, 215-6, 220, 268
 Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, 20
 Napoleon III, 27, 29, 33, 45
 Northcote, Sir Stafford, 189, 200
 O'Conner, F., 22*n*, 120
 Odger, G., 98-9, 172*n*, 272*n*
 O'Donoghue, 125, 127
 Osborne, R. B., 155, 226
 Overend, Gurney & Co., 59-61
 Pakington, Sir John, 156, 200, 208
 Palmer, Sir Roundell, 155
 Palmerston, Lord, 26-28, 37, 40, 87-8, 91-2, 133, 135-7, 139-40, 144, 152
 Pauperism, 52-3, 74-5, 77-8, 80-2, 84, 109, 132-3, 182
 Peel, Gen., 188, 194-5, 197, 199, 200, 221
 Peel, Robert, 153, 188
 Place, Francis, 17
 Poor Law of 1834, 20, 22
 Population, 14-17, 24
 Potter, G., 83*n*, 113, 120-1, 123, 125-6
 Prices, 23, 56-8, 64-9, 74, 81
 Railways, 23, 60, 62, 113
 Redistribution, anomalies of, after 1832, 13-7
 Reform Bill of 1832, 13, 22, 28, 94, 101, 139, 152, 165, 175, 177-8, 231, 246, 253; of 1852, 26; of 1854, 26; of 1859, 27-8, 136, 188; of 1860, 28, 87, 138; of 1864, 87; of 1865, 91; of 1866, 16, 94-5, 97, 100, 116-7, 123, 133, 135, 138; introduction of, 139-48; franchise qualifications of, 142-3; reception of, 144-6; second reading, 148-53; redistribution, 148-9, 153-8; in committee, 158-60; defeat of, 160, 185-7; arguments for and against, 160-84; of 1867, popular attitude toward, 126-9, 219; introduction, 200-2; second reading, 202-5; in committee, 207-17; motion for 3rd reading,

- 217-9; in House of Lords, 219-20; royal assent, 220; influence of Gladstone upon, 221-5; influence of Bright upon, 225-7; influence of Disraeli upon, 227-32; influence of popular opinion upon, 232-4; effects upon the parties, 246-8, 254-7; effects upon the position of the working class, 257-8, 265, 268-75; of 1884-5, 266-8; of 1918, 268
- Reform League, 33*n*, 36*n*, 89-91, 95, 98, 101-2, 104-5, 107, 116-7, 120-1, 123-5, 129-30, 133-4, 215, 225, 232, 263, 266
- Reform League, Irish, 125
- Reform meetings of the '60s, 89, 91, 93-7, 101-2, 106-13, 118, 124-5, 127-8, 134, 190, 198, 225, 234
- Reform of Upper House, 21, 267, 275*n*
- Reform Union, 101, 107, 224*n*
- Registration, changes in system, 260-2
- Resolutions offered by Conservative Government, 125, 192-3, 195-6, 218
- Ricardo, 98
- Russell, Lord John (1st Earl), 17, 22, 25-6, 28-9, 34, 46, 87-8, 92, 111, 136, 138-40, 145, 152, 185, 187, 191-2, 233, 244
- Scotland, 88, 112, 141, 153-4, 163, 213, 228, 249, 252, 258-9, 260, 268
- Shaftesbury, Lord, 187, 233, 236, 241, 243
- Smith, Goldwin, 129-30
- Social legislation in the twentieth century, 275
- Stanley, Lord, 148, 158, 187*n*, 188, 197*n*, 249
- Strikes, 73, 79, 82-3, 115, 169, 179, 274
- Tea-room schism, 207, 223
- Ten-Minutes Bill, 193-6, 198
- Trade in '50s, 23; in early '60s, 51, 57, 88; in 1865, 52; in 1866-7, 58, 61-5, 76-80, 83-4, 109, 166, 190
- Trade unions, 17-8, 74, 83, 90, 105-6, 114-8, 120-2, 131, 134, 170-1, 179, 182, 232, 269, 270, 272-4
- Unemployment, 23, 53, 56-7, 65, 69, 74-8, 82-3
- Wages, 23, 52-3, 56-7, 61, 65, 67, 69-74, 78, 81, 83, 88, 99, 166, 172
- Walpole, S. H., 28*n*, 102, 104-5, 112, 158, 188, 198
- War, Crimean, 24, 26; Civil, 38, 52-3; Austro-Prussian, 31, 65, 79, 185; Boer, 274; Great, 275
- Woman suffrage, 214, 268
- Working classes desirous of economic betterment, 18, 21-2, 85, 98-100, 109-110, 118, 122, 130-3, 171, 242
- Workingmen, feeling of, toward the Conservatives, 100-1, 129-30, 209, 237-8, 242-5, 246

THE POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES
AS REGARDS INTERVENTION

STUDIES IN HISTORY, ECONOMICS AND PUBLIC LAW

EDITED BY THE FACULTY OF POLITICAL SCIENCE
OF COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

Volume XCIII]

[Number 2

Whole Number 211

THE POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES
AS REGARDS INTERVENTION

BY

CHARLES E. MARTIN, Ph.D.

Assistant Professor of Government, University of California, Southern Branch

New York
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY
LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., AGENTS
LONDON: P. S. KING & SON, LTD.

1921

COPYRIGHT, 1921
BY CHARLES E. MARTIN

To

MY FATHER AND MOTHER

WHOSE CARE AND DEVOTION

NO TRIBUTE OF MINE

CAN EVER REPAY

PREFACE

Chief-Justice Marshall, in a famous decision, significantly declared: "No principle is more universally acknowledged than the perfect equality of nations. Russia and Geneva have equal rights." International law has no more fundamental principle, and this view is sustained by such authorities as Grotius and Vattel.

The motive which inspired the Declaration of Independence was the desire for freedom from foreign political and commercial control, and for individual freedom. It was declared that life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness were the "inalienable rights" of individual men. As these rights were to be guaranteed to men as individuals, so could they be claimed for states as independent units in the society of nations.

The principles which gave to our early statesmen the inspiration of domestic policy soon found expression in our foreign relations. The most fundamental one was that of "non-intervention." As our foremost principle of foreign policy, it bears a close relation to the rights of the individual as a basis for relations within the state, and to the principle of the equality of nations as the foundation of sound international intercourse. In effect, the principle of non-intervention prevented interference in the internal affairs of other nations, and reserved to each state the right to choose its own form of government and to control its political destiny. Moreover, it required abstention from the political arrangements of other governments, and more especially of Europe.

It has been my purpose to set forth the history and development of this, the cardinal principle of our foreign policy, which is so typical of our political ideals and institutions. This embraces not only a discussion of its origin and adoption by our statesmen as a definite principle of foreign policy, but also the extension of that principle so as to apply to the independent states of America in a special sense. This phase of the policy of non-intervention, commonly called the "Monroe Doctrine," was designed to preserve the Western hemisphere from the territorial and political control of foreign powers.

Moreover, it has been my purpose to discuss and explain departures from the principle of non-intervention by the United States. The capital instances of departure were in Cuba and in Panama. Our interventions in these cases sustained a direct relation to the establishment of Cuba and Panama as independent states. They also led to arrangements under which the United States guarantees their independence. These interventions rest upon the ground that the principle of non-intervention is subject to exceptions, and that each case must rest upon its own merits.

I have, therefore, limited my discussions of departures from the principle of non-intervention to the cases of Cuba and Panama, and shall reserve for the future publication a discussion of special situations which have come to prevail in Santo Domingo, Nicaragua and Haiti, and which involve a degree of supervision which non-American powers would be forbidden to exercise in these countries. Unlike the interventions in Cuba and Panama, our interventions in these states have not contributed to the establishment of their independence. These steps have been taken, first, to arrange for the settlement of claims of citizens of foreign states, thus preventing intervention for this purpose by other powers; and, secondly, to restore and preserve order and political stability.

Such measures of control have been exercised in Santo Domingo since 1905, when a modus vivendi was concluded by President Roosevelt which provided for the collection of Dominican customs by an American citizen designated by the President of the United States, and for the payment of the government's obligations. This supervision was continued under the treaty concluded with Santo Domingo in 1907. In 1913, commissioners were sent to supervise the Dominican elections in the capacity of "friendly observers." In June, 1916, American forces were landed to restore order under the supervision of the United States.

Events leading to intervention in Nicaragua occurred in 1909, when the American government refused to recognize further the Zelaya government. In 1912, marines were landed to restore order, and in 1914, a treaty was signed with Nicaragua, giving the United States exclusive right to build a canal along the Nicaragua route, together with leases of sites for naval stations and a naval base. For these concessions, the United States agreed to pay $3,000,000.

This tendency of departure has been manifested in Haiti. Certain European governments demanded a settlement of claims. Revolutionary disturbances followed, and in 1915, American forces were landed. In 1916, a treaty was approved by the Senate, under which the United States agreed to supervise the collection and administration of customs and the training of a native constabulary. Haiti agreed to enter into no engagements which would impair her independence.

These special situations, whether conventional or de facto in character, are manifestations of a tendency the permanency of which remains to be tested. It is my purpose hereafter to treat the more recent interventions, some of which are now pending. While it is a matter of prediction as to the direction which these departures will take, it is unlikely that the development will ignore altogether the purposes and limits of the principle which has so distinguished the foreign policy of the United States.

I am indebted to Professor Edward Elliott of the University of California, who first directed my interests into the field of international law; and to Professor John Bassett Moore of Columbia University, for guidance and counsel in all phases of my work.

CHARLES E. MARTIN

BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA, AUGUST, 1920.

CONTENTS

PART I

THE FORMATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE POLICY OF NON-INTERVENTION

CHAPTER I

THE ORIGIN AND ADOPTION OF THE AMERICAN POLICY OF NON- INTERVENTION

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION	19
Ancient and European backgrounds as a means for understand- ing American policies.	19
"State interest," alliances, and the balance of power in the Greek city-states and in Rome.	19
Medieval influences	20
The rise of the nations	21
Intervention in Modern Europe	22
The doctrine of non-intervention	23
Intervention during the Revolutionary period	23
Status of European diplomacy at the outset of the war for American Independence.	23
International questions resulting from the Revolution	24
Revolutionary diplomacy	24
The desire for diplomatic relations with neutral states . .	24
Wharton's division of "schools" of diplomacy,	25
The resolution of Congress	26
Diplomatic agencies during the Revolution	26
Objectives of American diplomacy.	26
The question of recognition	27
The attitude of neutral European countries	27
Relations with France.	28
French sympathy and interest in the Revolution	28
The mission of Franklin, Deane and Lee.	29
Instructions of the secret committee to the mission. .	29

	PAGE
Agreement of the commissioners not to conclude a separate peace.	30
The change in Revolutionary fortunes	31
The audience with Vergennes	31
Note of Louis XVI to Charles III.	32
The French treaties of 1778	32
Treaty of amity and commerce.	32
Treaty of alliance	33
Ratification.	35
Intervention during the post-Revolutionary period	35
The adoption of the Constitution and the outbreak of the French Revolution; the election of Washington	36
Washington's attitude toward the French Revolution.	37
The outbreak of war in 1793	37
The appointment of Genêt as Minister to the United States.	38
Questions submitted by Washington to his Cabinet as to the reception of Genêt, and the renunciation or suspension of the French treaties	39
The Cabinet meeting of April 19, 1793	40
The Jefferson-Hamilton controversy.	41
The views of Jefferson.	41
The views of Hamilton	42
The arrival of Genêt as French minister	46
His commissioning of privateers.	46
Jefferson's views of neutral rights and duties.	47
Genêt's recall; his defense.	48
Neutrality as related to non-intervention	49
Neutrality proclamation of April 22, 1793	50
The Napoleonic wars	51
The protection of neutral rights	51
French decrees and complaints	52
The mission of C. C. Pinckney	55
The course of President John Adams; the mission of Marshall, Pinckney and Dana.	56
The X, Y, Z affair	56
Measures approaching war	57
Mission of Ellsworth, Davie and Murray.	57
Non-intervention as a principle of American political philosophy.	59
Difference in geographical conditions	59
Difference in government	60
The views of Locke; the right of revolution and the natural rights of man	61
The views of Congress	62

	PAGE
The attitude of John Adams.	63
The Farewell Address of President Washington	65
Summary: non-intervention during the Revolutionary and post- Revolutionary periods	66

CHAPTER II

THE EXTENSION OF THE POLICY OF NON-INTERVENTION

Limitations of the early declarations of policy	69
The question of the attitude of the United States toward the rela- tions of European powers with other American states.	69
Steps taken by the United States leading to security in territory and navigation	69
The revolutions in Spanish America	71
Recognition by the United States; Mr. Adams' recognition theory.	73
The policy of the United States with respect to European interven- tion in independent American states	73
European backgrounds of the American policy	77
The Holy Alliance	77
The alliance of November 20, 1815.	78
The Conference of Troppau	80
The Conference of Laibach	81
The Congress of Verona.	81
The application of the principle of intervention as recog- nized by the Holy Alliance to the Americas; concern of the United States	82
Mr. Canning's proposals to Mr. Rush	85
The views of President Monroe	85
The views of Jefferson and Madison	86
Discussion with Russia over colonization and the question of recognition.	86
The definite extension of the policy of non-intervention to the independent states of America	87
Cabinet deliberations	87
The question of a joint declaration	87
The question of an answer to Russia.	91
The compromise of the Cabinet as to the form and character of the message	93
The Monroe message of December 2, 1823	94
The principle of non-intervention	94
The non-colonization principle	96
The Panama Congress	97

	PAGE
Factors leading to the extension of the principle of non-intervention to the independent states of America	98
The United States as the champion of the principle of non-intervention; cases involving the application of the principle . .	99
Attitude of the United States toward the continued non-recognition by Spain of the revolted Spanish colonies	99
Cases arising in relation to Mexico	100
Representations made by Minister Poinsett	100
Proposed European interventions, 1858-1860	102
President Buchanan's proposal of American intervention .	105
French intervention in Mexico, 1861-1867	107
Cases arising in relation to Venezuela	109
Question of American interposition	109
Proposed joint intervention, 1871	110
The Venezuela boundary dispute	111
English, German and Italian reprisals against Venezuela, 1902-1903	115
Cases arising in relation to Brazil	118
Question of American alliance and intervention	118
The Brazilian naval revolt, 1893-1894	119
Cases arising in relation to the Argentine republic	123
Question of American intervention	123
The Falkland Islands affair	124
Question of American interposition	126
Cases arising in relation to Chile	127
The Egan asylum case	127
The Chile-Peruvian war	129
Significance of the cases involving the application of the principle of non-intervention in its establishment as a definite policy	135

PART II

DEPARTURES FROM THE PRINCIPLE OF NON-INTERVENTION BY THE UNITED STATES

CHAPTER III

INTERVENTION IN CUBA

Early Cuban relations	139
Views of early statesmen	139
Opposition to European aims and proposals	140

	PAGE
Steps proposed to safeguard American interests	142
The "Ten Years' War," 1868-1878	144
Policy of President Grant and Secretary of State Fish	144
Colombian proposal of general interposition by the states of America	145
Instruction No. 266; justification of the right to intervene, and the duty of the United States to act	146
Its communication to the European powers; their replies . . .	147
The insurrection of 1895, and steps leading to intervention . . .	149
Intervention	154
The McKinley message of April 11, 1898; grounds of interven- tion.	154
The resolution of intervention	156
The outbreak of hostilities.	158

CHAPTER IV

INTERVENTION IN THE REVOLUTION AT PANAMA, 1903

The treaty of 1846 between the United States and New Granada. .	162
Guarantee of neutrality and sovereignty	163
Guarantee of free and open transit	165
The recognition of Panama	167
The Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty.	167
The Reyes-Hay controversy	168
President Roosevelt's special message to Congress, January 4, 1904.	170

PART I

THE FORMATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF
THE POLICY OF NON-INTERVENTION

CHAPTER I

THE ORIGIN AND ADOPTION OF THE AMERICAN POLICY OF NON-INTERVENTION

THE attempt to find in Ancient and European systems the sources and inspiration of American foreign policy is doomed to failure. Not only is identity lacking, but fancied analogies tend only to mislead. European and American policies differ, both historically and theoretically. At the outset, it is well to indicate the scope of the subject and to insist upon the fact that European practice cannot be made to approach American practice, and vice versa. Nevertheless, knowledge of a system entirely different from our own aids materially in gaining an adequate understanding of the American system, by comparison and contrast, if not by identity and analogy. Moreover, American international practice during and after the American Revolution has had at least an indirect relation to European practice. A brief review of the factors entering into the formulation of American policy will contribute to a more comprehensive treatment of the subject.

The theories of state-interest and the right of self-preservation, from which is deduced the principle of intervention, are by no means peculiar to Modern Europe. The Greek and Roman legal and political theorists eloquently championed these ideas. The feeling of the time is best expressed by Aristotle who contended that the state is a self-sufficient body, and that the desires of the individual should be subordinated to the interests of the state. The true interests of the individual, indeed, were identical with the interests of the state, because the state could desire only the best for its citizens. With the conception of the primacy of the state well established, it was not difficult to extend the policy of seeking the interests of the state to its international relations, and to cause the will of the state to prevail over exterior, as well as interior, forces. Certain conceptions of the Roman law have been incorporated into international law; and certain others, while not so incorporated, have influenced the conduct of nations profoundly. The conception of state-interest, which treats the maintenance of the position and prosperity of the state as superior to all other considerations, was expressed in alliances, designed to preserve the peace of the Mediterranean, or to check the inordinate power of ambitious states. The adoption of the principle of the balance of power, also, led to the formation of alliances for its preservation. When the balance of power was destroyed, crippled, or perhaps threatened, it was the duty of the alliance to act. This action, based on the doctrine of necessity, inevitably resulted in intervention in the affairs of another state or group of states. We have, then, the Greek and Roman system ante-dating the Modern European system, and differing little from it. The idea of state-interest extended to a group of states, by means of alliances designed to preserve the balance of power, furnishes the key, generally, to the history of the principle of intervention. Intervention to preserve rights of succession, and intervention by one state alone, constitute exceptions to the rule. The practice of intervention continued in the Ancient world until the principle of the balance of power yielded to the expansion of the Roman Empire.

Roman Imperialism, while superseding the principle of the balance of power, served to make possible at a later time the comity of nations by acquainting the colonies comprised in the imperial domain, subsequently to become states, with the aims and civilization of the Roman world. A family of nations, governed in their exterior relations by a body of rules called international law, could not be established, based merely on the practice of the Mediterranean area. Christianity was a leavening force, placing emphasis on interests other than those merely national in character, and especially on the belief in a universal brotherhood. The Crusades did much to bring the Western nations together. Thus, a "community of interests" among the nations was getting a firm hold. The Reformation, causing alliances to be formed ostensibly on grounds of faith as opposed to grounds of race, but actually on grounds of conquest and expansion, played an important part. But it remained for the discovery of the New World to quicken the European nations with an appreciation of their international responsibilities and opportunities. The desire for colonies and for the conquest of inferior peoples, while bringing the nations into conflict, had a distinctly sobering influence on them; for extended colonial expansion has for its counterpart increased complexity in foreign relations.

Following the bringing of the states into closer relations, certain influences operated to reestablish and preserve the balance of power and alliances. The most potent of these influences was the rise of the nations. The break-up of the Roman empire and of the empire of Charlemagne, and the subsequent rise of France and England as nations, settled the fact that European political development should be national in character. The interests of the Papacy were best served, not by European political unity, but by national political unity. The Holy Roman Empire by its failure only hastened the development of the nations. Nicolo Machiavelli, writing in the fifteenth century, advocated the doctrines or "reasons of state" and political expediency. This was the first concrete expression of the later theory of the balance of power. The Italian states made use of the principle when Naples, the Pope, Tuscany, Venice and Milan attempted to maintain a balance of power between them. The growth of commerce and the dominance of Spain in the sixteenth century further demonstrated the necessity of some sort of equilibrium among the states of Europe. Strong absolutism in France, and the Bourbon and Hapsburg dynastic rivalry were disturbing elements. It remained for the Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia definitely to establish the balance of power and the status quo in Europe.

The Peace of Westphalia did not remove from European politics the danger of an ambitious state. The power of Spain had declined and was no longer to be feared. Louis XIV, desiring to humiliate the Hapsburgs and to give to France the leadership of the Roman states, greatly disturbed the peace of Europe. His doctrine of natural boundaries and frontiers could only lead to intervention. The treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1668 served further to establish the balance of power. Intervention for rights of succession is well illustrated in the eighteenth century. The War of the Spanish Succession, in which France was opposed by the intervention of the Grand Alliance, was settled by the Peace of Utrecht in 1713. By this peace France was reduced to her original position as an ordinary European power. The war of the Austrian Succession, while giving the Hohenzollerns a victory over the Hapsburgs, did not settle the points at issue, and the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle proved to be only a truce. The Seven Years' War, however, had definite results. English dominance in North America was established, and France and Spain were humiliated. The treaty of Paris in 1763 settled the controversy between England, France, Spain and Portugal. The treaty of Hubertsburg brought the war to an end between Austria, Prussia and Saxony. The treaties did little to encourage a "lasting peace." The principle of partition was applied to Poland by the partitions of 1772, 1793, and 1795. Intervention, then, was a definite principle in the European political system.

Opposed to the theory of intervention was the doctrine of non-intervention. It did not, however, gain much approval, except among the smaller states. It is obvious how difficult it was for such a principle to flourish in Europe. No sovereign state would agree not to intervene in the internal affairs of another state, when such abstinence might seem directly to involve its own existence; and non-intervention might have meant the ruin even of a large European state, so long as the system of alliances continued. The adoption of non-intervention as a deliberate and consistent policy was reserved to the United States; the wisdom of which became very real after an instructive experience with a European alliance and a narrow escape from being drawn into the European conflict during the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars.

The status of European diplomacy at the outbreak of the war for American Independence was practically the same as at the close of the Seven Years' War. England had succeeded in establishing a position of maritime and colonial supremacy against the opposition of France and Spain. The American colonists had fought valiantly on the side of England. But England did not make proper use of her victory. The colonists wanted individual, governmental and commercial freedom, together with the destruction of the then universal system of commercial monopoly. They finally became convinced that revolt was the only way to secure their natural rights, and they were willing to take this step, together with an assumption of its responsibilities.

The European powers were little in sympathy with England, but were not prepared to give the colonists any active and open support. The important thing to notice is that Europe was still governed by the principles of the balance of power, alliances and intervention; while the Americans, conscious of the evils of the European system, were to follow a new course, in which the principles controlling Europe were to have only a negative influence.

It is not strange that the question of intervention or non-intervention as a national policy should have arisen during the Revolutionary period. The Revolution, if successful, meant the creation of a new state with all the usual consequences, including the establishment of foreign relations. Questions of treaties, exchange of diplomatic representatives, alliances and intervention would naturally arise; and there would be a serious responsibility to assume in committing the government to a definite policy, the subsequent abandonment of which, whether forced or voluntary, might result in humiliation. The history of American foreign policy at this time is limited to the definition of our relations with the states of Europe. The extension of that policy, comprehending the other independent states of America and the relation of the United States and of the states of Europe to them, was reserved for a subsequent and different occasion.

The new government, soon after entering upon the war with England, sought admission to the family of nations by attempting to enter into diplomatic relations with the neutral states. In this it encountered serious obstacles. Independent states at war find diplomacy difficult; but a revolutionary government is more seriously embarrassed. At the outset American statesmen for the most part not only lacked experience in international relations, but, what is even more important, they lacked the means and opportunity to conduct such relations effectively.

According to Wharton, there were two schools of thought in Congress—those who favored and those who opposed the exercise of a highly centralized executive authority. The conflict between these schools continued until the adoption of the Constitution, and persisted subsequently in dealing with questions of construction and interpretation. Both schools attempted to extend their ideas of internal administration to diplomacy. The first, represented by Samuel Adams, John Adams and Richard Henry Lee, did much to spread propaganda against Great Britain, but did not equal the other school in constructive statesmanship during the progress of the Revolution and afterward.¹ Such influence in Congress prevented efficiency, not only in diplomacy but in war and finance as well. Dr. Franklin was the ablest and shrewdest diplomatist of the Revolutionary era, as will be shown in considering the negotiation of the French treaties. Morris, Livingston and Jay were constructive diplomatists, while the work of Jefferson and Hamilton at home was doubtless equal to the work of Franklin in France. It is an easy matter to magnify the importance of Wharton's distinction, and to attempt to explain tendencies by it for which it can in no degree be held responsible.

The success which our Revolutionary diplomatists eventually achieved must be credited to their own ability rather than to any guidance or aid from Congress. The organization of the department of foreign affairs was anything but satisfactory. In both the determination and the administration of foreign policies, experience seemed to be the only teacher of Congress. The first diplomatic organ during the Revolution was established by resolution of Congress:

¹ Wharton, Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, vol. i, p. 253.

NOVEMBER 29, 1775.

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed for the sole purpose of corresponding with our friends in Great Britain, Ireland and other parts of the world, and that they lay their correspondence before Congress when directed.

Resolved, That this Congress will make provision to defray all such expenses as may arise by carrying on such a correspondence, and for the payment of such agents as they may send on this service.¹

The members chosen for this work were Mr. Harrison, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Dickinson and Mr. Jay. The selection of Dr. Franklin and Mr. Jay was not sanctioned by John Adams, Samuel Adams and Arthur Lee.² This resolution is doubly important because it was the first step taken to organize a department of foreign affairs and the first effort to get in touch with European countries. The committee of foreign affairs was established in April, 1777, taking over the work of the committee of secret correspondence.³ The constant changing of the personnel of the committee and the lack of a permanent executive officer imperiled the work of the committee from the start. The President of Congress directed the diplomatic correspondence when no committee existed for the purpose. On August 10, 1781, Robert R. Livingston was appointed Secretary of Foreign Affairs. Congress, however, entrusted him with little discretionary authority.

The conflict in Congress over the question of administration led to the practice of what Wharton calls "militia" diplomacy. The Congress paid little regard to the rules of diplomacy, while some, like John Adams, chafed under them. Determined to establish diplomatic relations with

¹ Wharton, op. cit., vol. ii, p. 61.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 554.

³ Ibid., vol. i, p. 456.

European governments, Congress insisted upon sending ministers to all foreign courts without inquiring as to whether they would be received. The chief object of these missions was to borrow money. Dr. Franklin regarded them as indiscreet. In a letter to Arthur Lee, March 21, 1777, he very clearly stated his judgment of the ultra-enthusiasm of Congress in hastening foreign intercourse: "I have never yet changed the opinion I gave in Congress, that a virgin state should preserve the virgin character, and not go about suitoring for alliances, but wait with decent dignity the applications of others. I was overruled; perhaps for the best."¹

The quest of recognition at some of the European courts resulted unfortunately for the revolted colonies. Contrary to Franklin's advice, Congress commissioned Arthur Lee to Madrid and to Berlin, William Lee to Vienna, Dana to St. Petersburg, Adams to The Hague, and Izard to Florence; all with instructions to secure both recognition and subsidy. None of these representatives was officially received. The prestige of the United States was wounded, both by the practice of sending unwelcome representatives, and by the manner of the appeals. Congress did not seem to take into account the likelihood that the recognition of the United States by neutral powers would be considered by Great Britain as an act of intervention.

Spain did not care to risk the consequences of recognizing the independence of the United States. Frederick the Great of Prussia was by no means opposed to the American revolt, but commercial and neutral interests prevented him from according recognition. Russia was at this time championing neutral rights, and hence could not afford to abandon her neutral position. The Netherlands had no inclination to become involved in the American war, until complications with England made it imperative. The French alliance was the only one secured during the Revolution. While it proved of value in winning the war for independence, it was at the same time an alliance which some of our ablest statesmen later sought to avoid, and which, without proper leadership, would have led to disastrous consequences.

¹ Franklin, Works, vol. vi, p. 83.

The American-French relations during the Revolution directly involved the question of American interference in European affairs. Encouraged by representations from the French court, Franklin favored seeking an alliance with France, but with no other power. The reasons for French sympathy with the Revolution were older than the Revolution itself. They dated back to the treaty of Paris of 1763. The Seven Years' War brought nothing but humiliation to France. That country had lost its position in the New World. With her navy destroyed, her army defeated, and her commerce badly crippled, France attempted to repair her fortunes and to restore her former prestige. If an alliance with the revolted American colonies would produce this result, she would not hesitate to enter into negotiations. Louis XV favored the encouragement of discontent in the British colonies. The accession of Louis XVI to the throne was followed by the appointment of Vergennes as foreign minister. Vergennes was not sentimentally interested in the Revolution. He watched the American situation carefully with the idea of French intervention in mind. Bonvouloir was sent to America on a secret mission to secure information and to indicate to the American leaders that they might secure aid from France, should war follow. Bonvouloir was received by the secret committee, but refused to commit France to any definite policy of alliance or intervention. He stated that France "wished them well" and might possibly participate in the war.¹ His impressions were conveyed to Vergennes, who at once gave himself to a serious study as to how far France should actively aid the Colonies.

On October 2, 1776, the secret committee received from Congress a draft of a treaty of commerce and alliance between France and the United States, together with the appointment of Dr. Franklin, Thomas Jefferson and Silas Deane as commissioners to negotiate the treaty. The committee transmitted this information to Silas Deane. In the absence or disability of any one or two of the commissioners, the other was given full power to act. The committee advised Deane, however, to await the arrival of Franklin and Jefferson before communicating the commission to the French ministry.² On December 4, Franklin informed Deane of his arrival, of the appointment of the commissioners, and of the selection of Arthur Lee, then at London, in place of Jefferson who had declined to serve.³ Deane at once communicated the arrival of Franklin to Vergennes.⁴

Congress now gave its attention in earnest to the proposed French alliance. The secret committee warned the American commissioners at Paris of the means England was taking to prevent foreign aid, especially French, from being given America. Prospects of accommodation, the committee declared, would effectually prevent foreign interference.⁵ It was, therefore, the most decisive note yet received by the American commissioners when the secret committee declared that "all views of accommodation with Great Britain but on principles of peace as independent states and

¹ Wharton, Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, vol. i, p. 334.

² Ibid., vol. ii, p. 162.

³ Franklin, Works, by Bigelow, vol. vi, p. 35.

⁴ Wharton, Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, vol. ii, p. 223.

⁵ Ibid., vol. ii, p. 227.

in a manner perfectly consistent with the treaties our commissioners may make with foreign states" were "totally at an end since the Declaration of Independence and the embassy to the court of France."¹ On December 30, 1776, Congress again urged the commissioners to hasten with their tenders of alliance.²

The secret committee's correspondence became largely memoranda of the military and financial situations for the intelligence of the commissioners. No further suggestions could help them. There was no longer any question as to the American policy of seeking foreign aid. The problem now was to complete the negotiations. So intense were the commissioners in their desire to prove America a faithful party to the proposed stipulations, that they agreed to the following personal pledge:

We, the commissioners plenipotentiary from the Congress of the United States of America, are unanimously of the opinion that if France or Spain shall conclude a treaty of amity and commerce with our states, and enter into a war with Great Britain in consequence of that, or of open aid given to our states, it will be very right and proper for us, or in the absence of the others for anyone of us, to stipulate and agree that the United States shall not separately conclude a peace, nor aid Great Britain against France or Spain, nor intermit their best exertions against Great Britain during the continuance of such war, provided always that France and Spain do on their part enter into a similar stipulation with our states.³

This pledge was an entering wedge toward a strong policy of alliance in that the right of making a separate peace was to be abandoned in case of reciprocal agreements with

¹ Wharton, op. cit., vol. ii, p. 229.

² Ibid., vol. ii, p. 241.

³ Ibid., vol. ii, p. 260.

France and Spain. The publication of the Articles of Confederation and the various state constitutions in French did much to increase confidence in the political sagacity of the Americans.¹ The commissioners under the leadership of Franklin did not lose courage, but informed the secret committee that while France would not treat with them as regards independence while at peace with Great Britain, yet American commerce was receiving the treatment accorded the most favored nation, and nothing could be gained by unreasonable haste.² On September 8, 1777, the American commissioners again communicated the status of negotiations to the secret committee.³ France still professed to England that she would observe all treaties. Prizes brought into French ports were restored, persons found fitting out armed vessels against England within French jurisdiction were imprisoned, and the exportation of warlike stores were prohibited. Privately the French court professed friendship, winked at the furnishing of supplies to America, and at the same time was preparing for war. It was playing a double part, thought the commissioners, the question which part would ultimately predominate being unsettled.

On December 8, 1777, the same day Congress resolved to recall Silas Deane,⁴ the American envoys addressed a communication to Vergennes which soon proved to be effective.⁵ An audience was granted by Vergennes on December 12.⁶ On December 17, Monsieur Gerard called upon the American representatives by order of the king, and informed them

¹ Wharton, op. cit., vol. ii, p. 287.

² Ibid., vol. ii, p. 324.

³ Ibid., vol. ii, pp. 388, 389.

⁴ Ibid., vol. ii, p. 444.

⁵ Ibid., vol. ii, pp. 444-445.

⁶ Ibid., vol. ii, p. 452.

that His Majesty had decided to enter into a treaty of amity and commerce. He said that the king desired a perpetual amity, and would both acknowledge and support American independence by every means in his power, even to the extent of going to war, which then seemed likely.¹ He would not even insist upon America not making a separate peace at her convenience, but he must require that in any peace made with England, the United States should not surrender their independence and return to British rule.² A courier was to be sent to Madrid to secure the concurrence of Spain. There were legitimate reasons for Spanish delay.

Perhaps the clearest expression of the French attitude toward the alliance is shown in the note of Louis XVI of France to Charles III of Spain, January 8, 1788.³ It is evident that the French in the formation of their alliances were not prompted by purely altruistic motives. His Most Christian Majesty was of the opinion that the Bourbon "system of alliance" would be best maintained by an alliance between himself, His Most Catholic Majesty, and the United States. The defeat of Burgoyne and the discouraging position of Howe had entirely changed things. It was the policy of England, thought the king, to pacify America, and then to fall on France with her maritime force, and the time was at hand to act, if reunion with the mother country was to be prevented.

Negotiations were hurried, and after certain communications between the commissioners and Gerard, treaties of amity and commerce, and of alliance, were concluded at Paris, February 6, 1778. The treaty of amity and commerce followed closely the projected Congressional plan.⁴

¹ Wharton, op. cit., vol. ii, p. 452.

² Ibid., vol. ii, p. 453.

³ Ibid., vol. ii, p. 467.

⁴ Ibid., vol. ii, p. 490.

The treaty established "firm, inviolable and universal peace, and a true and sincere friendship between the Most Christian King, his heirs and successors, and the United States of America."¹ It was agreed reciprocally to extend "most favored nation" privileges in commerce and navigation, to prevent discriminatory duties both in the United States and in France, and to extend reciprocal protection to the vessels of both countries. The remainder of the convention treated mainly of fisheries, contraband goods, treatment of prisoners of war, consuls, and of vessels, trade and navigation.

But the crowning achievement of the commissioners was the treaty of alliance, which has been aptly termed "the most important diplomatic event of the American Revolution."² By the first article an alliance was formed against Great Britain. In the event of war between Great Britain and France before the close of the Revolution, the United States and France agreed to "make it a common cause and aid each other mutually with their good offices, their councils and forces, according to the exigence of conjunctures, as becomes good and faithful allies." By article II the avowed purpose of the defensive alliance was to "maintain effectually the liberty, sovereignty and independence absolute and unlimited, of the United States, as well in matters of government as of commerce." There were certain important agreements as to operations. Each party should, acting for itself, do everything possible against the common enemy. In case concurrent action was necessary, the details of the case should be settled by a special convention. Any reduction of the British power in North America or in the Bermudas, should result in an enlargement of the territory of the United States. France renounced all claim to any territory in North America or the Bermudas that had formerly been ceded to Britain. The islands in the Gulf of Mexico were, in case of success, reserved to France.

¹ Malloy, Treaties and Conventions, etc., vol. i, p. 469.

² Moore, J. B., Principles of American Diplomacy, p. 14.

In Article VIII the contracting parties agreed not to conclude a truce or peace without the consent of the other, and engaged not to lay down their arms until American independence had been guaranteed by treaties. No claim of compensation could be made by one ally against the other, and a general invitation was extended to other nations to make common cause against Great Britain. The United States guaranteed to France the possessions held by the latter in America, and any others which might be gained by the treaty of peace; France guaranteed the liberty, sovereignty and independence of the United States, and the territories taken in the war. This reciprocal guarantee was to take effect the moment war occurred between France and England, if such should happen; if not, at the close of the war between the United States and England. A separate act was made, reserving to the king of Spain the right to agree to both treaties.¹

Franklin and Deane informed Congress of their success on February 8, 1778. On February 16, the three envoys transmitted the treaties to the committee of foreign affairs, remarking that "this is an event which will give our states such an appearance of stability as must strengthen our credit, encourage other powers in Europe to ally themselves with us, weaken the hopes of our internal as well as our external enemies, fortify our friends and be in many other respects so advantageous to us that we congratulate you upon it most heartily."² The best hope for the future of America, thought Congress and the commissioners, lay in the formation of foreign alliances. On May 4, 1778, Congress ratified the treaty which later brought the United States face to face with the question of interference in European affairs, and the treaty which brought to the front the question of intervention or non-intervention as an American policy. It was destined to test the statesmanship of Washington, Jefferson and Hamilton, and to be abrogated by an act of Congress in support of the policy adopted because of treaty complications with France.

¹ Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, etc., vol. i, p. 482.

² Wharton, Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, vol. ii, p. 495.

It may be said that France fully performed the obligations of the alliance. The unofficial aid privately given before the alliance was only a mere suggestion of the aid subsequently given. Large sums of money were constantly loaned. Supplies were obtained in France. The Marquis de Lafayette and other French officers and men rendered distinguished military service. And France paid the price for her alliance,—an act of intervention which led to war with Great Britain.

While the Revolution and the French alliance achieved the independence of the United States, the policy of the country as regards interference in European affairs was as yet to be finally determined. It is true that non-intervention was theoretically the policy of the United States, and that from the first discerning statesmen regarded America as a nation apart, with a different role to play in the world's affairs. Attention will be given to the influence of the non-intervention principle as a theory, but it is important at this juncture to examine the events leading up to the discussion of the intervention question and the circumstances under which the policy of non-intervention was adopted. Perhaps the most fundamental principle in the American foreign policy, it is essential to understand how it was tested and formally proclaimed in the post-Revolutionary period.

During the critical period immediately succeeding the Revolution, the government of the Confederation had perplexities enough, without concerning itself with the question of a permanent policy as regards intervention; but this question was not to be long postponed. The year 1789 was a memorable one. The Constitution became operative. Washington assumed his duties as President. Jefferson was relieved of his duties as minister to France and William Short was named in his stead.¹ In the same year the French Revolution broke out—a movement which evoked much American sympathy; and it was to be in the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars that the test of the strength of the non-intervention principle was to be made. The political theories of Locke and Rousseau as regards natural rights and especially as regards the right of revolution, had a deep effect in America and in France. It is difficult to determine just what part American sympathy played at this critical juncture when our non-intervention and neutrality policies were at stake. A celebration was held in New York on December 27, 1792, and a "Civic Feast" occurred in Boston January 27, 1793. Many popular demonstrations were held. The term "Citizen" became widely adopted. Jefferson, in writing to Monroe, May 5, 1793, said that the war between France and England was rekindling the spirit of 1776.² He declared:

A French frigate took a British prize off the capes of Delaware the other day and sent her up here. Upon her coming into sight thousands and thousands of the yeomanry of the city crowded and covered the wharves. Never before was such a crowd seen there, and when the British colors were seen reversed, and the French flag flying above them they burst into peals of exultation. I wish we may be able to repress the spirit of the people within the limits of a fair neutrality.

¹ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, p. 58.

² Jefferson, Writings, by Ford, vol. vi, p. 238.

The enthusiasm of the people, however, did not extend to the government of the United States. If the former had been the true test of the American attitude, France had good reasons to expect substantial aid from her ally. It was fortunate at this time that Washington, Jefferson and Hamilton were in control of the government. In his first inaugural speech and first annual address to Congress, Washington did not place much emphasis on the subject of foreign relations. He did, however, advocate provision for the national defence and the extension of foreign intercourse.¹ In his second annual address, December 8, 1790, he reminded Congress that the situation in Europe should invite America to greater circumspection in maintaining peace; that the tendency of a war could not be overlooked and should be met by preparation for war.² He prophesied commercial troubles, and recommended action to guard against it. Washington's private correspondence with Lafayette (July 28, 1791) reveals a wholesome attitude toward Europe, but also a desire to remain at peace with the world.³ He cleverly observed that the guarantee of peace caused the people to appreciate and uphold the government. Consistently with his avowed policy, he made no statements favoring or justifying the liberal movement in France except to Lafayette and on the event of the acceptance of the constitution by the French king.⁴ These statements were characterized by a quiet dignity.

The President, when war approached in 1793, was alert to the danger which might threaten America. On April 12, 1793, he wrote Secretary of State Jefferson that "War having actually commenced between France and Great

¹ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, pp. 65, 66.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 82.

³ Washington, Writings, by Ford, vol. xii, p. 59.

⁴ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, pp. 116-117.

Britain, it behooves the government of this country to use every means in its power to prevent the citizens thereof from embroiling us with either of those powers, by endeavoring to maintain a strict neutrality."¹ In addition he ordered Jefferson to give the subject "mature consideration," in order that appropriate action might be taken.

The news of the war was not the only event complicating the situation. The advice came that M. Edmond C. Genêt had been appointed minister to the United States, representing the new French republic, and that he was on his way to take up his duties. Minister Morris, in a note dated March 7, 1793, informed the government that Monsieur Genêt took out with him three hundred blank commissions, to distribute to such as would fit out cruisers in American ports to prey on British commerce.² Morris regarded this procedure as pernicious morally as well as leading to dangerous consequences. His note to Thomas Pinckney, American minister to Great Britain, on March 2, was more specific.³ He was certain that the Executive Council had furnished Genêt with the three hundred commissions, and was equally certain that France would benefit more as a nation from American neutrality than from an alliance. Feeling strongly on the subject, he suggested a proclamation of neutrality, and a denial of protection to all contravening it, leaving them at the mercy of the party taking them.

The Washington cabinet was immediately summoned. On April 18, the President sent a circular letter to the cabinet members, informing them of the delicate situation in which the United States was placed. In forming a general plan for executive action, he submitted the following questions for their consideration:

¹ Washington, Writings, by Ford, vol. xii, p. 279.

² Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 354.

³ Ibid., vol. i, p. 396.

1. Shall a proclamation issue for the purpose of preventing interference of the citizens of the United States in the war between France and Great Britain, etc.? Shall it contain a declaration of neutrality or not? What shall it contain?

2. Shall a minister from the Republic of France be received?

3. If received, shall it be absolutely or with qualifications; and if with qualifications, of what kind?

4. Are the United States obliged by good faith to consider the treaties heretofore made with France as applying to the present situation of the parties? May they either renounce them or hold them suspended until the government of France shall be established?

5. If they have the right, is it expedient to do either, and which?

6. If they have an option, would it be a breach of neutrality to consider the treaties still in operation?

7. If the treaties are to be regarded as now in operation, is the guarantee in the treaty of alliance applicable to a defensive war only, or to war either offensive or defensive?

8. Does the war in France appear to be offensive or defensive on her part? Or of a mixed and equivocal character?

9. If of a mixed and equivocal character, does the guarantee in any event apply to such a war?

10. What is the effect of a guarantee such as that to be found in the treaty of alliance between the United States and France?

11. Does any article in either of the treaties prevent ships of war, other than privateers, of the powers opposed to France from coming into the ports of the United States to act as convoys to their own merchantmen? Or does it lay any other restraint upon them more than would apply to the ships of war of France?

12. Should the future regent of France send a minister to the United States, ought he to be received?

13. Is it necessary or advisable to call together the two houses of Congress, with a view to the present posture of European affairs? If it is, what should be the particular object of such a call?¹

The foregoing questions, discussed in Cabinet meeting April 19, 1793, indicate Washington's broad grasp of the general situation. The opinion of the Cabinet was expressed concerning the first two questions only. As to question I, it was "Agreed by all that a proclamation shall issue, forbidding our citizens to take part in any hostilities on the seas with or against any of the belligerent powers, and warning them against carrying to any such powers any of these articles deemed contraband according to the modern usage of nations, and enjoining them from all acts and proceedings inconsistent with the duties of a friendly nation towards those at war."² As to question II, it was "Agreed unanimously that he shall be received." As to question III, it was decided that "This and the subsequent questions are to be postponed to another day."

Following the meeting of the Cabinet, Jefferson on April 28, 1793, delivered to the President his opinion on the general question: Whether the United States ought to declare their treaties with France void, or suspended. This opinion contained answers to questions II to VI, inclusive. He held that questions VII-X, being on the guarantee, could not be adequately answered apart from a situation to which they applied.³ On the twelfth question (as to the reception of a minister sent by the future regent of France) he was of the opinion that if the nation of France should ever reestablish such an office as regent, a minister should be received, but not from a regent set up by any other authority.⁴

¹ Washington, Writings, by Ford, vol. xii, p. 280.

² Jefferson, Writings, by Ford, vol. vi, p. 217.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 218.

⁴ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 219.

The questions submitted by Washington involved his two ablest Cabinet members in a notable controversy, which resulted in the formulation and adoption of our American policy of non-intervention in the political affairs of another nation. Jefferson's very able argument was marked somewhat by his democratic tendencies. He held that all acts by public agents under the authority of the nation, were acts of the nation, and could not be annulled or affected by any change in the form of government, or of the persons administering it. The treaties in question, therefore, were treaties between the United States and France and not between the United States and Louis Capet; and in spite of the fact that both nations had since changed their form of government, both had remained in existence and their treaties had not been annulled thereby.¹ Jefferson drew an analogy between contracts between nations and contracts between individuals, maintaining that non-performance was not immoral if performance was impossible, and that, if performance should become self-destructive to the party, the law of self-preservation overruled the law of obligation to others. He conceded that no nation had a right either to suspend or to annul its obligations merely because they were either useless or disagreeable; but in case they were dangerous, it was, he affirmed, a matter of the degree of the danger; and by a close chain of reasoning, he held that the degree of danger in this case did not justify annulment.² Jefferson concluded that the treaties were still binding, without regard to changes in government; that the clause of guarantee only suggested danger, and that only remotely; that extreme danger, and neither uselessness nor disagreeableness, was the test of the right of annulment or suspension; that the question of receiving a minister did not concern the treaty obligation; that the United States held at all times the right of suspension or annulment where the question of self-preservation was involved; and finally, that allowing the treaties to remain in operation did not amount to a breach of neutrality, while their abrogation would amount to such a breach, giving France just cause for war.¹

¹ Jefferson, Writings, by Ford, vol. vi, p. 217.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 220.

While Jefferson's treatment of the case was scientific and liberal, Hamilton took what he thought to be a more expedient view. He was imaginative enough, however, to anticipate a situation. In answering question III (whether the minister should be accorded an absolute or qualified reception, and if with qualifications, what kind), Hamilton held that the United States should previously declare to the French minister before his reception that the American government, desiring to maintain cordial relations and friendly intercourse with France, would accept his credentials and receive him as minister; yet, on account of the relations originally contracted between the two countries and the present state of affairs in France, the United States reserved the question of the temporary and provisional suspension of the treaties to future decision; and that the French minister should be apprised of the reservation.²

Hamilton relied upon a brief recital of the facts of the situation in France to strengthen his contention. The treaties were between the United States and the king of France, his heirs and successors. A new constitution accepted by the king had not changed the status of things. The seizure of the king and the declared suspension of the royal government was effected by a body unauthorized to destroy any other constituted authority. No convincing evidence had been produced against the king. Not mentioning other irregularities, the king had been put to death, bringing up the question whether or not it was an act of national justice. That the new government was irregular and had not established itself was evidenced by the fact that all Europe regarded it as an act demanding armed intervention to restore the royalty to power. The question, then, was concerning the future government of France—would the royal authority be restored or would a republic be established? Hamilton's contention was that the facts and circumstances proved that the revolution was not a free, regular and deliberate act of the French nation.¹

¹ Jefferson, Writings, by Ford, vol. vi, p. 231.

² Hamilton, Works, by Lodge, vol. iv, p. 370.

Arguing that the treaties ought to be renounced in the interests of peace, Hamilton declared that the existence of an option and its non-use were equivalent to abandoning neutrality for an alliance, hence giving the enemies of France just reason to regard the United States as an enemy; and if under the treaties we were not bound to go to war, it was due to casualty or inability; the former relieving us only in case of an offensive war, and the plea of inability being the weakest means of maintaining neutrality. The latitude other governments were taking in giving sanction to French treaties; the embarrassments ensuing in regard to the clause of guarantee, should the French cause fail; the refusal of European nations to treat with the new government, and their armed intervention in behalf of royalty; and the prudence of requiring the reservation of the question until the circumstances of the case furnished light for a right and safe decision; were arguments conclusive of the right of the United States to sever her alliance with France. In answer to the fourth question it was advanced that applying the principle of the first one taking up arms as conducting a defensive war, the facts revealed France as engaged in a war of offense only, while the alliance was clearly a defensive one.²

¹Hamilton, Works, by Lodge, vol. iv, p. 373.

²*Ibid.*, vol. iv, p. 397.

While arguing from different points of view, and assuming a given state of facts in certain cases, Jefferson and Hamilton in this Cabinet controversy made possible the policy of the United States before the actual circumstances arose to test the policy. It must be remembered that the questions were submitted by Washington before Morris informed the President of Genêt's plans in America. In trying to appraise the value of the opposing arguments, one is compelled to conclude that Jefferson was more academic and more liberal, with a greater appreciation of the duties of the United States under the treaties, and yet with a due regard for American rights and interests as well. Hamilton was governed purely by practical considerations. With him, the circumstances were the determining factor. Justifying renunciation on the grounds of danger to the United States, he entertained the same opinion of the French government as the enemies of France held, and he thought the American view should be identical with the European. They differed, naturally, in interpreting the authorities on the question of alliances. Jefferson believed that to renounce the alliance would be just cause for a declaration of war by France; Hamilton believed just as firmly that maintaining the alliance would lead to war with the enemies of France, and if war came, it would be better to fight for non-intervention and neutrality as permanent national foreign policies rather than to fight for the purpose of maintaining a questionable alliance. Jefferson regarded the French government as regular and the treaties as binding because, every nation having a right to change its form of government, the alliance existed between the nations and not between the governments. He accorded the revolutionary government both a de jure and de facto character. Hamilton, however, while admitting the right of a nation to change its government at will, denied that an alliance need be continued by a change in government. If the revolution be consummated and the government established and recognized, with strength to secure the performance of the alliance, the treaty would hold. But he took into account the probable circumstances. Without determining the de jure status of the French government (for which reasonable doubt was entertained), Hamilton refused to accord to the new French government a de facto character until it had established itself. With all Europe in arms, refusing to recognize the government as de facto, and intervening to restore the monarchy, the United States could not be guilty of a breach of neutrality by continuing an alliance with a government not as yet able to maintain itself, but would be guilty of an act of intervention by being the ally of a government the rise of which many governments regarded as in itself a ground for intervention. By insisting upon a reservation of the question of suspension and annulment until the circumstances of the case could be examined, and by declaring for the renunciation of the treaties, which in itself was a denial of the de facto character of the French government, Hamilton attempted to commit the United States to the extreme policy of abandoning treaty relations with a government which proved itself able to offer effective resistance to nearly all the states of Europe, on the grounds of non-recognition and intervention by enemy states opposed to the liberal form of government adopted by the French nation. To have followed Hamilton's course would have constituted a disparagement of revolution, both as a right and as basis of governmental succession, would have led to a test of governmental efficacy common to the old world but antagonistic to our principles, and would have led to an unwarranted discrimination between the French state and the French government. It would also have meant the unnecessary suspension or annulment of treaties at a time most likely to provoke war. Jefferson's view was the one adopted. With the likelihood of being called upon to perform dangerous obligations a matter of doubt, Jefferson declared that one ground alone would justify renunciation—the preservation of the life of the state. In defense of this, all alliances would be put aside. Some of the obligations might be useless or disagreeable, but they could be dealt with through diplomatic channels when the question should arise, and did not justify suspension. He recognized the right of revolution (through which means our government was founded), and recognized no distinction between a state and a government by reason of the government's liberal or revolutionary character, or the character of opposition entertained by intervening enemy states. His test was purely a de facto one. His dealings with the French government as Secretary of State with respect to the alliance and the war fully justified the wisdom of his course and definitely established his connection with the origin and adoption of the policies of non-intervention and neutrality. By the abrogation of the treaty of alliance with France by act of Congress, July 27, 1798, the policy of foreign alliances was definitely abandoned, but the policy of non-intervention antedates the abrogation, as stated by Jefferson and adopted by Washington as a policy in 1793.

The arrival of Genêt at Charleston, April 8, 1793, marked the beginning of many annoying acts on his part. He at once began fitting out and commissioning privateers before he had delivered his credentials or before he had even been recognized as minister to the United States. On May 23, he wrote to Secretary of State Jefferson, suggesting that the United States anticipate the stipulated payment of their debt to France by furnishing provisions and military stores.¹ The Secretary of the Treasury was of the opinion that there was no need for assigning any reason for non-compliance, since by the terms of its contract, the United States was not bound to make the payments.¹ The Secretary of State, however, thought that a reason should be assigned.² On June 11, Jefferson politely refused the proposal of the French minister.³

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 142.

Great Britain at once protested against the making of the United States a base of operations against that country. The British ship Grange was seized by a French cruiser within the capes of the Delaware. It was the opinion of Attorney General Randolph that the vessel had been seized in neutral waters and that restitution should follow.⁴ Hamilton favored restitution on the ground that the jurisdiction of the United States excluded the exercise of authority by France within American territory, except by express consent or by treaty stipulation.⁵ On June 5, Jefferson wrote Genêt :

After fully weighing again, all the principles and circumstances of the case, the result appears still to be, that it is the right of every nation to prohibit acts of sovereignty from being exercised by any other within its limits, and the duty of a neutral nation to prohibit such as would injure one of the warring powers; that the granting of military commissions within the United States by any other authority than their own, is an infringement on their sovereignty, and particularly so when granted to their own citizens, to lead them to commit acts contrary to the duties they owe their own country; that the departure of vessels, thus illegally equipped, will be but an acknowledgment of respect, analogous to the breach of it, while

¹ Hamilton, Works, by Lodge, vol. iv, p. 420.

² Jefferson, Writings, by Ford, vol. vi, p. 287.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 294-295.

⁴ Opinions of the Attorneys-General, vol. i, pp. 33-38.

⁵ Hamilton, Works, by Lodge, vol. iv, p. 409.

it is necessary on their part, as an evidence of their faithful neutrality.¹

Genêt replied :

The United States, friends of the French, their allies and guarantees of their possessions in America, have permitted them to enter armed and remain in their ports, to bring there their prizes, to repair in them, to equip in them, whilst they have expressly refused this privilege to their enemies.²

In a note of June 22, 1793, he attempted to defend the propriety of a military expedition within the United States against Great Britain. While actually engaged in aiding France in America, he was jealous that the United States should be a faithful ally. He urged that the American government prevent the fitting out of armed vessels hostile to France in American ports, and further demanded that the British privateer Jane be ordered away from American ports.³ And finally he demanded that the American government protect American rights and maintain the security of the American flag against British aggression.⁴

On August 23, 1793, Jefferson asked for the recall of Genêt.⁵ On September 18, Genêt made a vigorous reply, complaining of ill-treatment and humiliation, attacking Washington for slighting him and Hamilton for abusing him, complaining of the incompetency of the courts, and finally appealing to the people as against the government.⁶ On December 25, he disavowed any activities on his part to recruit an armed force within the United States, but he did

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 150.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 151.

³ Ibid., vol. i, pp. 154, 163.

⁴ Ibid., vol. i, p. 164.

⁵ Ibid., vol. i, p. 172.

⁶ Ibid., vol. i, pp. 172-174.

admit the granting of military commissions to American citizens in South Carolina for that purpose.¹ On January 20, 1794, Washington in a message to Congress stated that the conduct of Genêt had been unequivocally disapproved, and his recall would be expedited without delay.² Jefferson, in writing to James Madison, referred to Genêt's appointment as "calamitous," and referred to him personally as "hot-headed, all imagination, no judgment, passionate and disrespectful."³ In compliance with a reciprocal request, Washington recalled Morris as minister to France. at the same time expressing his highest regard for Mr. Morris in spite of the recall.⁴

The recall of Genêt ended a severe test of the American policy of neutrality favored both by Jefferson and Hamilton and adopted by Washington. In a communication of May 3, 1793, Genêt stated that his government had charged him "to propose to your government, to establish, in a true family compact, that is, in a national compact, the liberal and fraternal basis, on which she wished to see raised the commercial and political system of two people, all whose interests are confounded."⁵ The proposal was a definite invitation to strengthen the former alliance and if accepted would have led to intervention in the European war. The practical renunciation of the French alliance and the refusal of the United States to form either a "family" or "national compact" established more firmly the American policy of non-intervention.

The neutral policy of the United States is closely related to the policy of non-intervention. Both develop simultan-

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 317.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 314.

³ Jefferson, Writings, by Ford, vol. vi, pp. 338-339.

⁴ Washington, Writings, by Ford, vol. xii, pp. 433-434.

⁵ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 147.

cously, and the observance of one required the observance of the other. The treaties of 1778 concluded with France almost led the United States into the European conflict in the wars following the French Revolution; which intervention was prevented only by the strictest adherence to the policy of neutrality. But there was a further responsibility. The maintenance of neutrality, together with the duty of the United States as the champion of neutral rights, made the policy of non-intervention difficult to uphold. Attention will be given the questions of neutrality and neutral rights only as they are germane to the principle of non-intervention. The relation between the two policies of neutrality and non-intervention is clear. Physical separation from Europe; a new state in a new continent with a form of government entirely different from those of Europe at the time; the apparent advantages of a policy of separation from European alliances maintaining the troublesome principle of the balance of power; were influences which contributed to the adoption and the maintenance of both policies.

The rights and duties of neutrals had not been clearly defined. The attitude of the United States toward the European conflict was to be an epoch-making decision. The French treaties, already discussed, complicated this problem. It was decided at the meeting of the Cabinet, April 19, 1793, that a proclamation of neutrality should issue. The proclamation was issued in April 22:

Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands, of the one part, and France on the other; and the duty and interest of the United States require, that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent Powers:

I have therefore thought it fit by these presents to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid towards those powers respectively; and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever, which may in any manner contravene such disposition.

And I do hereby also make known, that whatsoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations, by committing, aiding or abetting hostilities against any of the said Powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, will not receive the protection of the United States, against such punishment or forfeiture; and further, that I have given instructions to those officers, to whom it belongs, to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, with the cognizance of the courts of the United States, violate the law of nations, with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.¹

In spite of the efforts of the United States to maintain a strict neutrality, the relation of this country to the wars growing out of the French Revolution continued to be perilous. With the renewal of the war between England and France in 1803, the Republican party, under the leadership of President Jefferson, was forced to grapple with the problem anew. Whatever sympathy Jefferson may have had for France did not in any way alter the consistent policy of a "fair neutrality" which he advocated while Secretary of State and rigidly adhered to as President. Whatever clamor had existed for the formation of a French alliance in 1793 had absolutely disappeared by 1803. There was no time, however, when the great majority of citizens did not uphold the government in its policies of non-intervention and neutrality.

While engaged in preventing violations of American neutrality, the United States government was equally concerned with the protection of commercial and neutral rights. The French decrees and the British orders in council threatened the very existence of neutral commerce as well as the sanctity of neutral rights. The question as to how far belligerents could prey upon neutral commerce was fully as important as the question of neutrality. John Jay concluded a treaty of amity, commerce and navigation with Great Britain on November 19, 1794. The object of this treaty was to settle the question of neutral rights as far as the United States and Great Britain were concerned. By article XVII, enemy goods could be taken from neutral vessels.¹ By article XXIII, asylum was granted to ships of war.² By article XXIV, privateering was forbidden to any holding commissions from any state at war with either country.³ The negotiation of the Jay treaty with the most effective enemy of France made clear the position of the United States as a neutral power, and rendered the hope of American intervention in the war on the side of France an impossibility.

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 140.

The displeasure of France was expressed by additional decrees against neutral commerce, and by complaints officially made against the United States. On March 9, 1796, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs communicated to Mr. Monroe the complaints of the French Republic against the United States. The first general complaint was as regards the inexecution of treaties. The first example was "the submission to our tribunals of the cognizance of prizes brought into our ports" by French privateers, in spite of the treaty clause covering the subject.⁴ Mr. Monroe answered that "those rights which are secured by treaties form

¹ Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, etc., vol. i, p. 601.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 603.

³ Ibid., vol. i, p. 604.

⁴ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 658.

the only preference in a neutral port which a neutral nation can give to either of the parties at war; and if these are transcended, the nation so acting makes itself a party to the war, and, in consequence, merits to be considered and treated as such."¹ To the complaint that English ships of war had been admitted to American ports in contravention of Article XVII of the commercial treaty of 1778, it was maintained that the enemies' warships were not barred by the treaty except when accompanied by prizes.² As regards the judicial proceedings against the captain of the Cassius, it was stated that while the treaty (article nineteen) stipulated that "the commandants of vessels, public and private, shall not be detained in any manner whatever," yet the treaty contained no stipulation as to the right to arm, and not to have proceeded judicially would have amounted to a collusive breach of neutrality.³ M. de la Croix complained of the outrage committed by a British frigate and aided by a British consul against the French minister, on the ground that the punishment inflicted by the United States was not commensurate with the indignity imposed.⁴ The revocation of the consul's exequatur and the expulsion of the British vessel from American waters, combined with a formal protest to England, was all the United States could do, since there was no effective fleet.⁵ In support of the last general complaint that by the Jay treaty the United States had "knowingly, and evidently sacrificed their connections with the republic and the most essential and least contested prerogative of neutrality," M. de la Croix alleged that the United States had departed from the principles of the armed neutrality and to the prejudice of France had

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 660.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 660.

³ Ibid., vol. i, pp. 660-661.

⁴ Ibid., vol. i, p. 659.

⁵ Ibid., vol. i, p. 661.

abandoned the limits of contraband; and had even extended contraband to include provisions.¹ Monroe answered that Great Britain had never acceded to the principles of the armed neutrality, and that the United States had agreed upon the most liberal list of contraband which Great Britain would recognize.²

Other complaints were presented by M. Adet, the French minister, to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State. He protested that the United States had questioned whether or not it should execute the treaties, "or receive the agents of the rebel and proscribed princes." It was replied that the conduct of the United States as proved by the facts, was exemplary; and on account of the rapid succession of revolutionary events, the American government had the right to deliberate.³ To the charge that the President had issued "an insidious proclamation of neutrality," the Secretary of State answered that the object of the proclamation was to preserve the United States in a state of peace, to be observed by an impartial neutrality.⁴ M. Adet was also reminded that the French ministers had declared that the French government did not desire the United States to enter the war. Protests were made against Hamilton's instructions to the collectors of the customs, the neutrality laws, the treatment of French privateers, the Jay treaty, and favoritism on the part of the United States to England. The blockade of the French colonies, Mr. Pickering stated, was an active one and binding on all neutrals alike.⁵ He also contended that the United States had aided France in various ways, citing as examples the aid given M. Genêt,

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. i, p. 659.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 661.

³ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. v, p. 595.

⁴ Ibid., p. 595.

⁵ Ibid., vol. v, pp. 596-597.

the meeting of the debt to France and the aid given relative to the insurrection in Santo Domingo.¹

In spite of the efforts to reply satisfactorily to the complaints of the French government, new decrees were issued, directed against neutral commerce. On August 22, 1796, Mr. Pickering informed Mr. Monroe of his recall. Mr. C. C. Pinckney of South Carolina was named as his successor.² M. de la Croix informed Mr. Monroe that the Directory would "no longer recognize nor receive a minister plenipotentiary from the United States until after a reparation of the grievances demanded of the American government, and which the French republic has a right to expect."³ Pinckney was directed to leave France. He was even denied the privileges of a resident alien. A new decree was issued by the French Directory, the substantial effect of which was to declare a "general and summary confiscation of American vessels."⁴ In February of the next year, Mr. Pickering filed formal complaints against the French government for alleged interference with American commerce.

The suspended diplomatic relations made the situation more serious. The President of the Directory, Barras, said in an unfortunate speech:

France . . . strong in the esteem of her allies, will not abase herself by calculating the consequences of the condescension of the American government to suggestions of her former tyrants. . . . They will weigh, in their wisdom, the magnanimous benevolence of the French people with the crafty caresses of certain perfidious persons who meditate bringing them back to their former slavery.⁵

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. v, p. 597.

² Am. State Papers, Foreign Relations, vol. i, p. 741.

³ Ibid., vol. i, p. 746.

⁴ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. v, p. 599.

⁵ Am. State Papers, Foreign Relations, vol. ii, p. 12.

In a message to a special session of Congress, May 16, 1797, President John Adams reviewed the relations of the United States with France.¹ Adams complained of the insults to Pinckney, but he was more enraged at the speech of Barras, which he thought more serious because it was dangerous to American independence, for, while it was studiously marked with indignities to the American government, it also suggested the separation of the people of the United States from its government.² He suggested that such insults should be decisively repelled so as to convince France and the world that the United States were "not a degraded people, humiliated under a colonial spirit of fear and sense of inferiority, fitted to be the miserable instruments of foreign influence, and regardless of national honor, character, and interest."³ This wound in the American breast Adams faithfully tried to heal. On May 31, 1797, Pickney, John Marshall and Francis Dana were nominated as ministers to France. Elbridge Gerry finally replaced Dana. They were given plenary power to settle all differences with France. They were given protection by Talleyrand, but a formal reception was at first refused.

Three gentlemen known as X, Y, and Z suggested that as a douceur for the members of the Directory who had been offended by the President's message, a sum of money would be required, and that a loan to the government would also be necessary. Pinckney reminded them that he had been treated with great disrespect, but said that he would treat for a reconciliation on honorable terms journily with his colleagues. Finally, after some negotiations, the American envoys offered to send one of their number forthwith to America to interview the government on the matter of a loan, if proceedings in regard to captured American ships would be suspended. Later the envoys informed the intermediaries that in spite of the course of the Directory, they must guard the interest and honor of America; and further, they would no longer hear propositions from persons having no authority to act. A new decree was issued January 17, 1798. On January 28, a formal review of the questions between the two countries was submitted to Talleyrand. In March an audience was granted. The matter of a loan, the Jay treaty, and other complaints were mentioned. The ministers disclaimed all authority to agree to a loan. Talleyrand informed them that he would be disposed to treat with the one whose opinions were most impartial (meaning Gerry). They replied that negotiations could only be considered jointly, whereupon Pinckney and Marshall left France. Gerry remained, only to be recalled.

¹ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, p. 233.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 235.

³ Ibid., vol. i, p. 235.

The treatment accorded the American representatives aroused much hostility in the United States. President Adams said in a message to Congress: "I will never send another minister to France without assurance that he will be received, respected and honored as the representative of a great, free, powerful, and independent nation." Measures were taken to prepare for war. It was the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States that actual maritime warfare not only existed between France and the United States, but a maritime war authorized by both nations. The indignation of the United States caused Talleyrand to alter his course. He suggested through the French legation at The Hague, that any minister sent to France by the United States would receive the treatment demanded by President Adams in his message of June 21, 1798. Our participation in the war against France was thus narrowly averted.

Ellsworth, Davie and Murray were sent as ministers in response to the above overture, with full powers to negotiate, but with specific instructions. They claimed that the treaties of 1778 had been abrogated by a solemn public act only after France had in many ways violated the treaty of amity and commerce. The French plenipotentiaries claimed that they could not consider the treaties as annulled; there had been no state of war as far as France was concerned. They regarded an abrogation as provocation to war, and in that case would refuse to treat further unless negotiations were preceded by a treaty of peace. To have insisted on American claims would have led to war. Their consideration was postponed to avert such a condition. The French would not agree to deal separately as regards the question of claims and treaties. A treaty was signed September 30, 1800. By article II it was agreed that since no concurrence could be reached in respect to the treaties of alliance, amity and commerce of 1778, and the convention of 1788, nor upon the alleged indemnities of both nations, negotiations would continue at a more convenient time. The convention and treaties in the meantime were to have no operation. Provision was made for the commercial relations between the two countries.¹ This article was expunged on demand of the Senate. It was agreed that the convention should be in force for eight years from the time of the exchange of ratifications. This brought to an end the long struggle between France and the United States over the treaties of 1778, which were the main factors in bringing up the question of intervention. The conflict over them resulted in the adoption and maintenance of the policy of non-intervention.

Non-intervention in its relation to the government as a practical policy has already been discussed in detail. The formation of the French alliance, and the trouble caused by it during the wars growing out of the French revolution, together with the maintenance of neutrality and the protection of neutral rights, illustrate the practical workings of the policy. But the theory of non-intervention existed as a political principle and as a part of the political philosophy of American statesmen, both during and following the Revolutionary period, quite apart from any question of alliances, neutrality, or neutral rights. The fact that these unforeseen questions played a definite part in the maintenance of the policy and sorely tested it, and our consistent adherence to it in spite of all complications, demonstrate most clearly that the policy was one of conscious purpose, designed to be maintained, if possible, in all emergencies; it was not a matter of casual development. The purpose was already fixed in the minds of the statesmen. The application of the purpose had to await the matter of state action, which always limits the operation of a theory.

¹ Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, etc., vol. i, p. 497.

The reasons for entertaining such a theory are obvious. The matter of geographical isolation was the most apparent. Edmund Burke made much of the physical separation of England and the Colonies in his plea for conciliation. This reason, while very clear as a prima facie matter, has a few practical applications to the American situation. Physical separation from the mother country prevented the colonists from securing equal rights with English citizens. It also gave England every advantage to stifle the Colonies commercially, and to control the seas as far as colonial trade was concerned. The disadvantages of physical separation under political union demonstrated clearly the manifold advantages of both physical and political separation. The idea was given more practical significance in the Revolutionary war, when the Americans saw how difficult it was for a power of Europe to conduct a successful war in America because the base of operations was so far removed from the territory of the European belligerent.

The second reason for the adoption of the principle of non-intervention was found in the American form of government, and in the conception of the right of revolution. Wars to preserve the balance of power had largely originated in the design to save or to enhance the position of reigning monarchies. The establishment of a republican government with no royal house would eliminate such dynastic wars as had been the curse of Europe. Current political theories and their diversities were well represented in the writings of Hobbes, Locke and Rousseau. All three writers espoused the conception of the social contract, but their applications of it were very different. Hobbes inferred from it that men had consented to the establishment of an all-powerful sovereign. The state existed to maintain order and the rights of property; but their maintenance was in the discretion of the sovereign, who made the laws but was not himself bound by them. Any state was better than no state, since the condition of war which existed previous to the establishment of society was more terrible than the tyranny of the worst prince. The sovereign power, when once relinquished and conferred, could not be alienated. This theory was more applicable to the English system than to any other. Locke drew different conclusions. There were certain inalienable rights which could not be surrendered by the individual. The state was established to maintain life, liberty and property through the institution of a known law and a common judge. The purpose of the state was secured through the establishment of a government, the duty of which was to protect life, liberty and property. Whenever government failed to secure these purposes, it might be overthrown and a new one set up in its place. This was very acceptable philosophy to the Americans. Rousseau held that the individuals conferred all their rights and powers on an organized society which was the sovereign power, and gave expression to its sovereignty through the general will. Government, being only an administrative agent, could be changed at will by the sovereign power.

Instead of adopting one of the extremes, American statesmen took the middle ground as advocated by Locke. To admit that the sovereign only could maintain rights, that the sovereign was not bound by law, and that sovereignty once conferred, could not be alienated, would be to favor royalty and the consequences of dynastic quarrels. On the other hand, to conclude that the government could be changed at will without qualification was not satisfactory. Americans were satisfied to reason that certain rights could not be conferred; and if the government formed to secure these rights could not guarantee them, it could be overthrown. The right of revolution, then, was justified only on the grounds that a government failed to secure the natural rights of man. The Declaration of Independence is practically a statement of these principles. It was declared that when any form of government did not secure these ends, it was the right of the people to abolish it. But while the right was recognized, stress was laid upon the seriousness of the step. "Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed."¹ The Declaration then goes into detail, enumerating the failures of the British government to secure these rights, thereby justifying political separation from England. It is well to point out the wisdom of the American course. To have adopted the view of Hobbes would have led either to colonial submission or to the establishment of an independent monarchy with all its dangers; while, to have followed the principles of Rousseau would have meant the carrying of the right of revolution to the straining point. Its effect was seen in France, when the effort was made to carry liberty to all oppressed peoples. The adoption of either of these extremes might have resulted in the virtual abandonment of the policy of non-intervention.

¹ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, p. 3.

The Congressional view was strictly in favor of the non-intervention principle. The management of foreign affairs after the adoption of the Constitution was practically transferred from Congress to the President. Congress would favor no policy which would suggest direct interference in European affairs. Such an attitude had been manifested by the Congress under the Article of Confederation in the matter of the armed neutrality. On May 21, 1783, in connection with the Dana mission to Russia and the desirability of a commercial treaty with that country, it was on motion of Mr. Hamilton, seconded by Mr. Madison, resolved: "That though Congress approve the principles of the armed neutrality, founded on the liberal basis of the maintenance of the rights of neutral nations and of the privileges of commerce, yet they are unwilling, at this juncture, to become a party to a confederacy which may hereafter too far complicate the interests of the United States with the politics of Europe, and therefore if such a progress is not yet made in this business as may make it dishonorable to recede, it is their desire that no further measures may be taken at present towards the admission of the United States into that Confederacy."¹ Congress had approved on October 5, 1780, the principles of the armed neutrality;² and the board of admiralty was instructed to prepare rules for the commanders of American ships conformable to those contained in the Russian declaration, while American ministers were authorized, & invited to do so, to accede to the principles. But on June 12, 1783, the Congress declared that the primary object of the resolution of October 5, 1780, and of the commission and instructions to Mr. Dana in regard to the accession of the United States to the neutral confederacy, could no longer operate, and that, as the true interests of the States required that they be as little as possible entangled in the politics and controversies of European nations, it was inexpedient to renew such powers to the American ministers abroad. And it was accordingly resolved:

¹ Wharton, Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, vol. vi, p. 438.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 438.

That the ministers plenipotentiary of these United States for negotiating a peace be, and they are hereby, instructed, in case they should comprise in the definitive treaty any stipulations amounting to a recognition of the rights of neutral nations, to avoid accompanying them by any engagements which shall oblige the contracting parties to support those stipulations by arms.¹

The most independent of American diplomatists was John Adams. From the first he was the spokesman and defender of the principle of non-intervention. On November 10, 1782, he disclosed in no mistakable terms to Mr. Oswald's secretary, his views on this question. He observed that there was something in the minds of the English and French which impelled them to war frequently, but if anything was done as regards peace which the Americans thought hard or unjust, "both the English and French would be continually blowing it up, and inflaming the American minds with it, in order to make them join one side or the other in a future war.”¹ He was of the opinion that Oswald had good reason to think that America would be glad to join France in such a war, and he took pains to undeceive him on this point.² He summarized his view in the following words:

¹ Wharton, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 483.

For my own part, I thought America had been long enough involved in the wars of Europe. She had been a football between contending nations from the beginning, and it was easy to foresee that both France and England would endeavor to involve us in their future wars. I thought it our interest and duty to avoid them as much as possible and to be completely independent, and to have nothing to do but in commerce with either of them; that my thoughts had been from the beginning to arrange all our European connections to this end, and that they would be continued to be so employed.³

A few days later he told Oswald that he was afraid the United States would be made the tools of the European powers and of their manoeuvring to get the United States into their real or imaginary balances of power.⁴ It should be the rule of the United States not to interfere, and of the powers of Europe not to desire or even permit such interference. Later, President Adams, in referring to certain French indignities, stated that France and the world should be decisively convinced that the United States would not be made “the miserable instruments of foreign influence.”⁵ He recognized that the American form of government exposed the United States openly to the “insidious intrigues and pestilent influence” of foreign nations,

¹ Wharton, op. cit., vol. v, p. 879.

² John Adams' Works, p. 307.

³ Wharton, Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, vol. v, p. 880.

⁴ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 11.

⁵ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, p. 235.

which could only be averted by an "inflexible neutrality."¹

The views of President Washington are best set forth in his Farewell Address of September 17, 1796. He warned the American people against favoritism towards or hatred of any particular nation. Favoritism could easily lead to an imaginary common interest where no interest really existed; and would easily lead to concessions to the favored nations which would be regarded as grounds for resentment by the others. He further pointed out how the favoritism of a small nation for a larger would result in the ultimate submission of the former to the rule of the latter, and how foreign influence was one of the most baneful foes of republican government. He stated his position in the following memorable words:

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign relations is, in extending our commercial relations to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop. Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise to us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

¹9 John Adams' Works, p. 277.

Why forego the advantages of such a peculiar situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice? ¹

A review of the more important factors involved in the origin and adoption of the American policy of non-intervention reveals that the formation of the alliance with France was the most important diplomatic event of the Revolution related directly to the origin and growth of the policy. The Revolutionary statesmen desired first of all to win their independence from Great Britain. Recognition and regular diplomatic intercourse with foreign nations was sought, as is done by every new state. The alliance was a matter of expediency on both sides. The Colonies desired aid from France and wished to negotiate a treaty as well. France desired the permanent separation from England of her American colonies. In order to secure their immediate needs, the American commissioners must, by a defensive alliance, agree to reciprocate in a similar emergency. The post-Revolutionary period was the great testing time. The French revolution and the wars growing out of it constantly threatened the position of the United States as a neutral country. The European struggle and the arrival of Genêt caused Washington to determine upon a policy of non-intervention and neutrality. The question of the absolute or qualified reception of the French minister and of the abrogation or suspension of treaties was referred to the Cabinet. All agreed upon a proclamation of neutrality. Jefferson believed that to renounce the alliance would be just cause for declaration of war by France; Hamilton believed just as firmly that maintaining the alliance would lead to war with the enemies of France. Hamilton favored a qualified reception; Jefferson held that any reception at all was a recognition of the legitimacy of the French government. Genêt was received and the alliance was not annulled. Washington was more inclined to Jefferson's than to Hamilton's view. The urgency with which Hamilton argued his case demonstrated his desire for a more complete separation from the European war. Both worked for a policy of non-intervention; the question was one of procedure. That the United States would have been in a better position without the alliance is obvious. The point is whether or not Hamilton would have defeated the very end for which he was striving by his own plan of procedure.

¹ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, p. 222.

The activities of Genêt only intensified American adherence to the policy which was the outgrowth of the famous cabinet meeting. His conduct was repudiated, and his proposals for an alliance were rejected. Hand in hand with the policy of non-intervention, we find the maintenance of neutrality and the protection of neutral rights. The consistent effort of the government to maintain these principles constantly threatened the existence of the non-intervention policy. The abrogation of the French alliance did not solve the treaty question. After many negotiations which in a few cases nearly led to war, the matter was practically settled by the treaty of September 30, 1800. The theory of non-intervention was an important matter in the practical evolution of the policy. Physical separation from England and a different form of government were the chief reasons for the existence of the policy as a fundamental principle of American statesmen. The writings of Adams, Washington, Jefferson and Hamilton prove this fact. The views of Congress prove the same. Some foreign policies develop casually without conscious direction. Others are the result of the discerning and guiding will of statesmen. The policy of non-intervention, while lacking an orderly plan of development, enjoyed the conscious and deliberate attention and direction of our ablest leaders. Its origin and adoption, then, is attributed to a conscious purpose, and not to circumstance or accident.

CHAPTER II

THE EXTENSION OF THE POLICY OF NON-INTERVENTION

NON-INTERVENTION in the politics of Europe having been definitely accepted by American statesmen as a cardinal rule of American foreign policy, based not only on physical conditions but also and in the main on a deep-seated belief in a distinct American destiny, political and social, the development of the principle only awaited the happening of events which should require its further application. Of immediate concern to the United States was the question of European colonial possessions in America. Not only the transfer of colonies from one European nation to another, but also the efforts of European governments to acquire new domains, by settlement or by conquest, would result in making territory adjacent to the United States a battle ground among European powers. The possibility of the expansion of the United States might be affected by each new treaty of peace made in Europe. Even the security of the country might be threatened.

From the very outset the United States was obliged to exert itself in order to secure commercial and territorial rights essential to the growth of a young nation. The first such struggle was that with Spain over the navigation of the Mississippi River. The vital importance of the Mississippi to the West was obvious. The restrictive control which Spain exercised over the lower part of the river was felt to be unendurable. A right of deposit at New Orleans was gained by the treaty of October 27, 1795. The next step was the acquisition of the territory of Louisiana. The cession of that territory by Spain to France had changed the entire aspect of our foreign relations. It was necessary for the United States not only to protect commercial rights already gained, but also to consider the territorial question. New Orleans would be the destination of hostile expeditions in case of war between Great Britain and France. Jefferson thought that French control of the Mississippi was to be resisted, even to the extent of forming an alliance with Great Britain. The situation was unexpectedly relieved by the cession of Louisiana by France to the United States on April 30, 1803. The territorial question, of so much concern to the United States, was being disposed of satisfactorily. A vast area was forever excluded from the sphere of contests between European powers, and the territorial integrity of the United States was further secured. The next step in excluding European territorial control was the acquisition of the Floridas. West Florida was claimed as a part of the Louisiana cession, while the hold of Spain on East Florida was feeble and uncertain. Both provinces, as well as other territory, were ceded by Spain on February 22, 1819. The free navigation of the Mississippi, the cession of Louisiana, and the cession of the Floridas, were three vital factors in the exclusion of European territorial and colonial influence. This cleared the way for the United States per se. It remained for subsequent events to require the extension of this policy beyond the limits of the United States to other American states for the mutual protection of all. The significance of the Louisiana cession was expressed by the commissioners as follows:

We cease to have a motive of urgency, at least, for inclining to one Power, to avert the unjust pressure of another. We separate ourselves in a great measure from the European world and its concerns, especially its wars and intrigues. We make, in fine, a great stride to real and substantial independence, the good effect whereof will, we trust, be felt essentially and extensively in all our foreign and domestic relations. Without exciting the apprehension of any power, we take a more imposing attitude with respect to all. The bond of our Union will be strengthened, and its movements become more harmonious by the increased purity of interest which it will communicate to the several parts which compose it.¹

While the United States was engaged in securing territorial gains, and thus making European colonial aggrandizement impossible as regards territory contiguous to the United States, other events were happening which required a definite American policy as regards recognition and a further development of the policy of non-intervention. These events centered in the revolt of the Spanish colonies in America and their struggle for independence. The cession of Louisiana by Spain to France had roused the country to the dangers that might ensue from the passing of the Spanish colonies into other European hands; and the United States was now confronted with additional questions as to the recognition of the independence of those colonies, and as to the attitude to be taken towards intervention by European powers to suppress that independence.

At the close of the American revolution, Spain's actual occupation of territory in the Americas was at its height. She owned, with the exception of Brazil, the entire country enclosed by the Atlantic coastline from the St. Mary's River in Florida to Cape Horn, and then northward along the Pacific coast to the archipelago of the Northwest coast. Most important to the United States at this time were the Floridas and Louisiana. Next came the Kingdom of New Spain, including Mexico, Texas, New Mexico and California. The Spanish colonies in South America were remote from the United States, both in a physical sense and in interest. The Spanish West Indies, however, were near enough to present a serious problem. The decline of Spain in Europe and the supervening chaos in her internal administration resulted in the disintegration of her vast American colonial empire. During the American revolution, France hesitated to join the United States because of her financial weakness. Spain's financial condition was still weaker. Later, the results of the French revolution to Spain were disastrous. Her misfortunes culminated when, in 1808, Napoleon placed his brother Joseph on the Spanish throne. This was promptly followed by revolts in Spain's South American colonies. The loyal adherents of the legitimate Spanish monarchy were inclined to assist the new régime, while others yet desired independence for its own sake. The liberal ideas advocated by Montesquieu, Rousseau and Voltaire found their way into Spanish America. The American and French revolutions seemed to give to those ideas practical effect. Subsequent history has shown how susceptible were the Spanish Americans to revolutionary propaganda. Moreover, the success of the American constitutional system exerted a profound influence.

¹ Am. State Papers, Foreign Relations, vol. ii, p. 559.

On January 10, 1811, President Madison communicated to Congress a letter, which had come into his hands, from the Chevalier de Onis to the loyalist Captain General of the Province of Caracas. De Onis had been sent to the United States as a diplomatic representative by the Central Junta, which, on the setting up of the Napoleonic government in Spain, was formed in the name of Ferdinand VII to maintain the independence of the nation, but the United States, in view of the conditions in Spain and the uncertainty as to government there, declined to receive him in his representative character. De Onis, in his letter, complained to the Captain General of the facility with which American vessels were admitted into the Spanish colonies, thus causing the people of the United States, as he said, "to believe that Spain's weakness did not permit her even to talk to them on equal terms, much less to take measures which might injure them."¹ It was from this source, he declared, that they gained the opinion that Joseph Bonaparte would rule in Spain and her colonies; "and hence the incitement to their scandalous conduct in promoting, by every means in their power, the machinations of Joseph to make himself master of our colonies, as if upon that depended our happiness."² De Onis's letter served to apprise Congress of the hopeless condition of Spain, and to attract attention to the question of the fate of the Spanish colonies. In the negotiations regarding the free navigation of the Mississippi, the fear was expressed by Spain that the principles of independence would spread among the Spanish colonists by communication with the Americans.³ President Madison, on the other hand, in referring later to West Florida, declared that the United States "could not see without serious inquietude any part of a neighboring territory in which they have different respects so deep and so just a concern pass from the hands of Spain to those of any other foreign power."⁴

In his message to Congress, November 5, 1811, President Madison dealt with the situation developing in the provinces south of the United States.⁵ "An enlarged philanthropy and an enlightened forecast concur in imposing on the national councils an obligation to take a deep interest in their destinies, to cherish reciprocal sentiments of good

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. viii, p. 404.

² Ibid., vol. iii, p. 404.

³ Ibid., vol. i, p. 261.

⁴ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, p. 488.

⁵ Ibid., vol. i, p. 494.

will, to regard the progress of events, and not to be unprepared for whatever order of things may be ultimately established." ¹ On December 10, 1811, a committee made a report to Congress relative to the Spanish-American colonies. The report took the form of a resolution on the subject of the decision of the colonies to "form federal governments upon the elective and representative plan, and to declare themselves free and independent." ² The United States beheld with friendly interest the establishment of independence by the Spanish provinces, as inhabitants of the same hemisphere, and they were promised that when they had attained the condition of nations, the House and Senate would unite with the President in entering into diplomatic and commercial relations with them as sovereign and independent states. ³ This was a promise of recognition, only on condition that a sovereign status should be attained.

American sympathy with the revolutionists in Spanish America did not determine the attitude of the government. Neutrality and the refusal of premature recognition of independence were consistently adhered to; but the recognition of their belligerency and the admission of their visits to United States ports were no doubt helpful to them. Joel R. Poinsett and Alexander Scott were sent to Buenos Aires and to Venezuela in order to promote commerce with the United States and to secure liberal and stable commercial regulations. They were to give certain information to the government. Rodney, Bland and Graham were sent at a later time to report on conditions in South America. In order the more effectively to maintain a policy of neutrality, President Madison issued a proclamation warning all citizens to have no part in hostile expeditions against the colonies of Spain.¹ On December 2, 1817, President Monroe in his first annual message to Congress, declared the policy of the United States to be one of impartial neutrality. He also clearly indicated the policy of the United States, should the question of recognition arise.

¹ Richardson, op. cit., vol. i, p. 494.

² Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. iii, p. 538.

³ Ibid., vol. iii, p. 538.

They (the United States) have [he declared] regarded the contest, not in the light of an ordinary insurrection or rebellion, but as a civil war between parties nearly equal, having, as to neutral powers, equal rights. Our ports have been open to both; and every article, the fruit of our soil, or the industry of our citizens, which either was permitted to take, has been equally free to the other. Should the colonies establish their independence, it is proper now to state that this government neither seeks nor would accept from them any advantage in commerce or otherwise which will not be equally open to all other nations. The colonies will, in that event, become independent states, free from any obligation to or connection with us, which it may not then be their interest to form on the basis of a fair neutrality.²

The United Provinces of South America, after declaring their independence, desired to be regarded by the United States as free, sovereign and independent.³ Don Manuel Hermenegildo de Aguirre was commissioned as minister near the United States. On January 6, 1818, Señor Don Aguirre suggested to the Secretary of State, after a previous interview, that the independence of the United Provinces be acknowledged by a formal act in the nature of a treaty.⁴ The recognition question will be followed here

¹Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. i, pp. 561-2.

² Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. iv, p. 130.

³*Ibid.*, vol. iv, p. 181.

⁴*Ibid.*, vol. iv, p. 182.

only as it opened the way to extend the principle of non-intervention to independent American states. On March 8, 1822, President Monroe recommended to Congress the recognition of the revolted colonies.¹ He justified such action on the grounds that Spain had done nothing to quell the rebellions. "When the result of such a contest is manifestly settled," he said, "the new governments have a claim to recognition by other powers, which ought not to be resisted."² On March 9, 1822, Joaquin de Anduaga protested vigorously to the Secretary of State against President Monroe's proposed recognition, "declaring that it (the United States) can in no way now, or at any time, lessen or invalidate in the least the right of Spain to the said provinces, or to employ whatever means may be in her power to reunite them to the rest of her dominions."³ To this protest Secretary of State Adams made a significant reply. He reminded the Spanish Minister that in the recognition of the independence of nations, the principles of right and of fact were involved, the former depending exclusively upon the determination of the nation itself, and the latter resulting from the successful execution of that determination.⁴ The United States had taken no part in the revolutions, and where war existed had been neutral. But the civil war between Spain and the new states was at an end. They had maintained and established their independence against all who had opposed it. The recognition, then, was merely the acknowledgment of existing facts, with the intention to enter into proper commercial and political relations. The United States had already defined its policy as regards the transfer of Spanish colonies from one sovereignty to an-

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. iv, p. 818.

² Ibid., vol. iv, p. 819.

³ Ibid., vol. iv, p. 846.

⁴ Ibid., vol. iv, p. 846.

other. The question of their independence was another thing. They were ultimately recognized on the grounds that they had successfully established and maintained their independence—an application of the non-intervening de facto principle of recognition.

But another and vital question soon arose. What would be the attitude of the European governments toward the new American States, and what policy would the United States adopt in regard to that attitude? It was one thing to recognize the independence of the Spanish-American states on the de facto principle, but to secure their independence against European aggression was quite another thing. Their independence was of great advantage to the United States, but an additional responsibility as well. The country had gone too far in establishing definitely the principle that the United States would have no political dealings with Europe, and had developed the counter-principle of European non-intervention to too great an extent, to depart from this policy, no matter where it might lead. As there could be no abandonment of the policy, an effort was made to provide it with an additional safeguard.

In order to understand the policy enunciated by President Monroe, it is necessary to review its antecedents. The defeat of Napoleon and the reconstruction of Europe by the Congress of Vienna made the reconsideration of the American question inevitable. The European coalition had intervened in France first to check the liberal movement which might spread to the other nations, and then to crush the inordinate ambition of Napoleon Bonaparte. This done, it was natural that the powers should seek to put down revolutions, to preserve the rights of succession, and to defend the principle of legitimacy even in America, whose example and influence could not be disregarded.

The treaty known as the Holy Alliance was concluded at Paris, September 26, 1815, by the Emperors of Austria and Russia and the King of Prussia. They declared the object of the alliance to be to publish to the world their fixed resolution to take for their sole guide, in the administration of their own governments and in their relations with every other government, the precepts of the Christian religion, justice, charity and peace. By article I, they agreed to "remain united by bonds of a true and indissoluble fraternity," agreeing to lend each other aid and assistance on all occasions and in all places. Article II provided that the sole principle of conduct was the rendering of mutual service. The three nations were recognized as three branches of one family, of which Christ was the sovereign. The subjects of these monarchs were exhorted to strengthen themselves in the principles and exercise of the Christian religion. By article III, all powers avowing these principles and recognizing the necessity of their application were invited to join the alliance.

Together with other treaties signed at Paris, November 20, 1815, a treaty of alliance was entered into by Great Britain, Austria, Prussia and Russia providing for the restoration of the monarchy in France and the control of Europe. The contracting parties considered that the repose of Europe was "essentially interwoven with the order of things founded on the maintenance of the Royal authority and of the Constitutional Character," and were determined to use all their means to prevent a further disturbance.¹ The treaty provided for the maintenance of an allied army in France, and renewed the engagements made the year before, one of which was the treaty of the eleventh of April, 1814, by which Napoleon Bonaparte and his family were forever excluded from the rule of France. The concert thus formed managed with a rigid vigor the affairs of ¹3 Br. and For. State Papers, p. 273.

Europe. The purpose of the alliance is clearly stated in the second article:

And as the same Revolutionary principles which upheld the last criminal usurpation, might again, under other forms, convulse France, and thereby endanger the repose of other States; under these circumstances, the High Contracting Parties, solemnly admitting it to be their duty to redouble their watchfulness for the tranquility and interests of their people, engage, in case so unfortunate an event should again occur, to concert amongst themselves, and with His Most Christian Majesty, the measures which they may judge necessary to be pursued for the safety of their respective states, and for the general tranquility of Europe.¹

By article VI of the above treaty, the contracting parties agreed to renew their meeting at stated periods for the more effective execution of their plans and for the consideration of any new situations which might arise.² The bitterness and resentment of the French against the continued occupation of France by the allied army, and the growth of the monarchy in favor, which might be increased by evacuation, occasioned the conference of Aix-la-Chapelle. A declaration was made by the courts of Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia and Russia on November 15, 1818, relative to the arrangements concluded between France and the allies. They regarded their efforts as the work of peace and the completion of a political system which would assure its continuance. This union between the monarchs, representing their peoples' interests, offered to Europe its only safe and sacred pledge of future tranquility.³ It had as its object the maintenance of peace and the guarantee of those transactions on which the peace was founded and consolidated. The fundamental basis of the Union was declared to be the resolution never to turn aside, either in their dealings among themselves or in their relations with other states, from the observance of the strict principles of the law of nations. Further meetings were to be held to consider common interests and particularly the questions in which the intervention of the governments was formally asked. The repose of the world was declared to be motive of the Union at all times.¹

¹ 3 Br. and For. State Papers, p. 277.

² 3 Br. and For. State Papers, p. 279.

³ 6 Br. and For. State Papers, p. 19.

Metternich summoned the Conference of Troppau to determine the principles on which the Powers could intervene in Naples. He held that Christian interests in Naples were European interests; that revolutions were legitimate when initiated from above and no intervention should be allowed; that they were illegitimate when enforced from below, and no such change should be recognized. Castlereagh denied that these were proper grounds for a Conference, as the powers were not bound so as to act by the treaties. The representatives of Great Britain and France were not given power to act.² A preliminary protocol was entered into privately between Austria, Russia and Prussia, espousing the principle of intervention:

States which have undergone a change of government due to revolution, the results of which threaten other states, ipso facto cease to be members of the European Alliance, and remain excluded from it until their situation gives guarantees for legal order and stability. If owing to such alterations, immediate danger threatens other states, the Powers bind themselves, by peaceful means or if need be by arms, to bring back the guilty state into the bosom of the Great Alliance.³

¹6 Br. and For. State Papers, p. 19.

² Phillips, W. A., Confederation of Europe, p. 221.

³*Ibid.*, p. 222.

Great Britain refused to agree to the protocol. Castlereagh declared that Great Britain was neutral as regards Naples, and that the proposal would restore the general system of guarantee, both territorial and political, which was abandoned at Aix-la-Chapelle.¹ He also distinguished between the French revolution and other revolutions. The signatures to the protocol were withdrawn and the Conference adjourned to meet at Laibach in order to allow the King of Naples to attend. Here the same debate continued, Great Britain and France opposing the stand taken by the three autocratic powers, Austria, Prussia and Russia. There was, therefore, a distinct difference between the ideas of the Western liberal powers and the original members of the Holy Alliance.

The Congress of Verona was called to consider the revolutionary movement in Spain. France immediately asked the allies whether they would withdraw their ministers from Madrid should France do so. In case of war, how would the allies express their moral and material support? Emperor Alexander was of the opinion that the question was a European one, not French.² Wellington urged the allies not to become the enemies of Spain, and declared that Great Britain could not be party to interference in that country.³ By a treaty of November 22, 1822, it was declared that representative government was incompatible with monarchical principles, and they engaged "to use all their efforts to put an end to the system of representative governments, in whatever country it may exist in Europe, and to prevent its being introduced in those countries where it is not yet known."⁴ The liberty of the press was to be sup-

¹ Phillips, W. A., Confederation of Europe, pp. 223-227.

² Ibid., pp. 269-270.

³ Ibid., p. 274.

⁴ Hart, The Monroe Doctrine, p. 46.

pressed, and the clergy were to be sustained in whatever measures they should adopt to preserve the authority of Princes. This adoption of the principle of intervention by the allied powers marked the formal withdrawal of Wellington from the Conference.

The various Congresses were held for practical purposes, not theoretical. The principle of intervention was a serious reality to the smaller states of Europe. The Congresses of Troppau and Laibach concerned the revolution in Naples. The Congress of Verona concerned the uprising in Spain. Austria intervened in Naples and in Piedmont. France intervened in Spain. Portugal was dangerously threatened, but protected by England. The purpose of the Holy Alliance was a real one, which, if extended to America, would cause infinite trouble for the United States.

The principle of intervention pursued by the Holy Alliance could result only in intervention in the Americas, if unopposed. Such intervention was regarded by the continental powers as their clear right. The Spanish colonies were discussed at the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, due largely to the insistence of France. Richelieu favored the establishment of the royal house of Bambara in the revolted provinces. The mediation asked by Spain was to be without force, the revolted colonies being treated as the loyal ones. Spain refused the mediation, as she was excluded from the Conference. France and Russia proposed that the United States be invited to a Conference at Madrid to consider the question of the Spanish colonies.¹ Richelieu regarded the United States as no source of danger; but an entirely new and complete republican world would endanger the old world. It was his purpose to get the United States to meet "in order to attach the United States to the general system of Europe and to prevent a spirit of rivalry and hatred establishing itself between the Old and the New World.”¹ May 13, 1818, President Monroe submitted the following question to his Cabinet: “Whether the Ministers of the United States in Europe shall be instructed that the United States will not join in any project of interposition between Spain and the South Americans which should not be to promote the complete independence of these provinces; and whether measures shall be taken to ascertain if this be the policy of the British government, and, if so, to establish a concert with them for the support of this policy.”² The ministers of the United States to France, England and Prussia were instructed to make known to those governments that the United States would have no part in any mediation or interference which did not have as its basis the absolute independence of the Spanish colonies.³ Russia unofficially invited the United States to become a party to the Holy Alliance, holding that it was essentially a pledge of principles. Mr. Adams, as Secretary of State, instructed Mr. Middleton, minister to Russia, to refuse explicitly for the United States. He stated to Mr. Middleton the following as regards the origin, growth and difficulties of the American policy:

¹ Phillips, W. A., Confederation of Europe, p. 256.

The political system of the United States is also essentially extra-European. The stand in firm and cautious independence of all entanglements in the European system, has been a cardinal point of their policy under every administration of their government, from the peace of 1783 to this day. If at the original adoption of their system there could have been any doubt of its justice or its wisdom, there can be none at this time. Every year's experience rivets it more deeply in the principles and opinions of the nation. Yet in proportion as the importance of the United States as one of the members of the general society of civilized nations increases in the eyes of the others, the difficulties of maintaining this system and the temptations to depart from it increase and multiply with it.¹

¹ Phillips, W. A., Confederation of Europe, pp. 256-257.

² Hart, The Monroe Doctrine, p. 48.

³ Moore, Digest of International Law, vol. vi, pp. 375-376.

The growing hostility of Great Britain to the Holy Alliance, and her aversion to the principle of intervention against all revolutionary movements has already been pointed out. A share in South American commerce was desired by Great Britain, but this could not be gained under Spanish control. In an interview with Richard Rush, American minister to England, Canning indicated the general outlines of British policy. Increasing difficulties surrounded the Spanish cause, he thought. The course of time and events had settled the separation of the colonies from Spain, although their recognition by Great Britain depended on circumstances. The British King had no intention of appropriating any Spanish territory in America to himself.² Any such attempt by France would not be acquiesced in by England. He proposed that England and America make known to the world their views on the subject. Rush could not give a definite reply. He was of the opinion that there would be no reconciliation between Spain and the colonies, but in case there should be, England would do nothing to prevent it.³ No formal recognition had taken place, but a commission of inquiry was likely to be sent to America to report on the status of the de facto governments. On August 20, 1823, Canning proposed to Rush that the time was at hand for an open avowal of their attitude. He submitted the following propositions:

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 378.

² Hamilton, Writings of James Monroe, vol. vi, p. 362.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 363.

1. We conceive the recovery of the colonies by Spain to be hopeless.

2. We conceive the question of the recognition of them, as independent states, to be one of time and circumstances.

3. We are, however, by no means disposed to throw any impediment in the way of an arrangement between them and the mother country by amicable negotiation.

4. We aim not at the possession of any portion of them ourselves.

5. We could not see any portion of them transferred to any other power with indifference.¹

Canning argued that if both countries were of this opinion, there was no reason why they should not confide in each other and publish it in the face of the world. It would put at rest the ambitions of European states, while ending the jealousies of Spain and the agitation in the colonies. He believed that an opportunity was never before afforded "when so small an effort of two friendly governments might produce so unequivocal a good, and prevent such extensive calamities."² Rush replied on August 23, agreeing to Mr. Canning's propositions, but disclaiming any authority to act.³ In writing to the Secretary of State, Rush feared that Canning knew of designs against the independence of the South American states.⁴ This fear was confirmed by Canning's notification to Rush (August 23, 1823) that a Congress on Spanish-American affairs was planned after the affairs in Spain were settled.⁵

President Monroe favored meeting the British proposal. He submitted Canning's proposals to Jefferson and Madison, asking three questions:

¹ Hamilton, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 365.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 366.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 366-367.

⁴ Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 368-369.

⁵ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 369.

1. Shall we entangle ourselves, at all, in European politics and wars, on the side of any power, against others, presuming that a concert by agreement, of the kind proposed, may lead to that result?

2. If a case can exist, in which a sound maxim may, and ought to be departed from, is not the present instance precisely that case?

3. Has not the epoch arrived when Great Britain must take her stand, either on the side of the monarchs of Europe, or of the United States, and in consequence, either in favor of despotism or of liberty and may it not be presumed, that aware of that necessity, her government, has seized on the present occurrence, as that, which it deems, the most suitable, to announce and mark the commencement of that career?¹

Jefferson regarded it as the most serious question since that of independence. He advised that the United States join Great Britain in the declaration, maintaining that the United States should oppose, with all its means, the forcible interposition of any other power, and especially the transfer of territory by any form of acquisition.² Far from embroiling us in British affairs, it was getting England to propose the very policy for which we stood. Madison thought it a matter of particular good fortune that the British and American policies coincided, even if based upon different considerations. He advised a joint declaration of policy, feeling secure that with England's aid America could have nothing to fear from Europe.³

Relations with Russia also furnished an occasion for defining the attitude of the United States towards European interference in the Americas. The controversy with Russia was twofold. In the first place, Russia had issued a ukase in 1821, claiming the Pacific coast of America as far south as the fifty-first degree of north latitude, and forbidding persons engaged in navigation or in fishing to approach within 100 miles of the sphere. Adams told Baron Tuyll that Russia would be opposed in any territorial establishment in the New World, and that the American continents were no longer subject for any new European colonial establishments. He also advised Mr. Middleton, American minister to Russia, that Russian settlements in the New World could only injure the peace of the world, and that settlements other than those already occupied by Russia must be left to American hands. In the second place, there was a discussion over the recognition of the South American de facto governments. Baron Tuyll announced that his government could not receive any agent of any of the de facto governments formed in the New World in contravention of the political principles for which Russia stood. He also expressed the hope that the United States would remain neutral in regard to the Spanish-American States, as it had declared itself to be, when recognizing them. This doubtless meant that the United States would be expected to do nothing in case of intervention. Adams expressed to Barron Tuyll "the hope of the government of the United States that Russia would on her part also continue to observe the same neutrality."

¹ Hamilton, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 324.

² Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 392-393.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 394-395.

Just as the declaration of the policy of non-intervention and neutrality was the outcome of a cabinet meeting in 1793, so thirty years later the formal extension of the policy of non-intervention was the result of a series of cabinet meetings. The Canning proposals were before the cabinet. Rush had reported in favor of joining Canning in a joint declaration, as expressed in his letter to the Secretary of State, August 23, 1823.¹ The questions raised by

¹ Moore, Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 391.

Baron Tuijl were also awaiting the action of the cabinet. The cabinet met November 7, 1823. Secretary of State John Quincy Adams in his "memoirs" interpreted the object of Canning to be "to obtain some public pledge from the government of the United States, ostensibly against the forcible interference of the Holy Alliance between Spain and South America; but really or especially against the acquisition to the United States themselves of any part of the Spanish American possessions."¹ Monroe had declared himself in favor of the joint declaration in a letter to Jefferson. Jefferson and Madison had expressed themselves in favor of the joint declaration. John C. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, advocated giving discretionary power to Rush to join Canning in a declaration against intervention on the part of the Holy Alliance, even if the United States should be required to agree not to take Cuba or Texas. His reason was that Great Britain had greater power to seize these territories, and the United States would gain from her a similar agreement.² Adams argued that the interests of the United States and those of Great Britain were not identical, and a joint declaration would give Great Britain a substantial pledge against ourselves; while a refusal would leave the United States free to act as emergencies arose.³ Monroe was opposed to any course of action which would appear to be subordinate to that of Great Britain. Adams saw clearly that a joint declaration would be likely to commit the United States in an embarrassing way, since it would concern not only the part Great Britain should play in American affairs, but also the part the United States should play, especially in case any of the revolted provinces should desire membership in the American federal system. Most important of all was the question whether the United States should bind itself in regard to its future policies of the New World or retain a free hand. At the meeting of the cabinet, November fourteenth, Monroe and Calhoun were despondent regarding affairs in South America. Adams was of the opinion that the Holy Allies could not permanently restore the Spanish-American states to Spanish rule. Calhoun, Adams said, "is for plunging us into a war to prevent that which, if his opinion is correct, we are utterly unable to prevent."¹ Adams suggested that Canning's proposals be subjected to a test of right and wrong. As the South American countries were independent nations, they themselves and no other nation had a right to make any disposition of their condition. The United States had no right to dispose of them either singly or jointly, nor did any other nation have such a right without their consent.² The Secretary of State gained his point and was directed to draft a dispatch accordingly, which he did on November 17th. While the President from later advices thought that Canning had changed his purpose, Adams still considered the alarm as affected, with a design to obtain from the United States a pledge not only to oppose the transfer of Cuba to France but to refrain from acquiring the island.³ On November 20th, the President was inclined toward Calhoun's idea of giving discretionary powers to Rush. Adams was utterly opposed to this, thinking that Rush should be distinctly authorized to act in specific contingencies, and in all others to report to his government.⁴ Adams presented a memorandum to this

¹ Adams, C. F., Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, vol. vi, p. 177.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 177.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 178.

¹ Adams, C. F., Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, vol. vi, p. 186.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 186.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 188.

⁴ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 192.

effect. Several substitutes were drawn up before the matter was finally settled, but the paper finally adopted was in the main a statement of Adams' views.¹

The message of President Monroe to Congress engrossed the attention of the Cabinet. The European political system and the necessity of proclaiming to the world, especially Europe, the attitude of the United States as to European interests in America, were questions of vital concern to the men engaged in the serious task of extending the traditional policy of non-intervention. The President submitted parts of his message on November 21st. It condemned the invasion of Spain by France, and acknowledged the independence of the Greeks, together with a recommendation that a minister be sent to them.² Adams dissented strongly from this view. He argued that we were at peace with the world, and this message would be a summons to arms against all Europe for objects of policy exclusively European—Greece and Spain. Europe had been in convulsions for thirty years. "Empires, kingdoms, principalities, had been overthrown, revolutionized, and counter-revolutionized, and we had looked on safe in our distance beyond an intervening ocean, and avowing a total forbearance to interfere in any of the combinations of European politics." With the serious situation thus facing the United States, Adams favored postponing any issue with Europe as long as possible, and by all possible means to maintain the tranquility of the nation and of the world.³ Calhoun doubted the existence of the state of tranquility suggested by Adams, and thought the time had come for an alarm to be sounded to the nation.⁴ On November 22, Adams again urged

¹ Adams, op. cit., vol. vi, pp. 193-194.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 194.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 194.

⁴ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 195.

President Monroe to abstain from anything in his message which the Holy Allies could construe as meaning aggression.¹ Should the Holy Alliance be determined to make an issue with the United States, it should be our policy to meet, and not to make it, and we should have all we could do to prevent intervention, without bidding them actual defiance in matters strictly European.²

On November 25, Adams proposed that a paper be delivered to Baron Tüyl, designed to be a "firm, spirited, and yet conciliatory answer" to the communications received from the Russian government, as well as an answer to the proposals of Canning to Rush.³ It was to be a discussion of the principles of the American government and of the political system to be maintained in the future. It was to be republican in that it would maintain its own independence and would respect that of others. It was to be pacific in that it would studiously avoid all involvement in the combinations of European politics, and cultivate friendship with the most absolute of governments. The United States wished to retain the friendship of the Emperor Alexander, but having recognized the independence of the South American states, the United States could not view with indifference any attempt of the powers of Europe by direct intervention either (1) to restore the Spanish rule on the American continents, (2) to introduce monarchical principles into these countries, or (3) to transfer any portion of the present American provinces of Spain to any other European power.⁴ Calhoun objected on the ground that the paper was too great a display of republicanism and would bring the United States into direct issue with

¹ Adams, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 196.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 197.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 199.

⁴ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 200.

the Holy Alliance. Southard and Wirt suggested that the paper was aimed nominally at Russia, but practically at the Holy Alliance.¹ Adams, however, felt that the time had come for an explicit answer to the Russian government. The status of things left the United States without an avowed policy, which he thought should be distinctly taken and resolutely maintained. He felt that the Holy Alliance would not invade South America, and he was equally sure that the Emperor Alexander did not intend to include the United States in his invectives against revolutions.² Such a note would bring a formal disavowal of any unfriendly attitude toward the United States, or it would reveal his exact intentions.³ Wirt thought that the United States was taking a serious responsibility in any event, and especially if we were assuming the attitude of menace without meaning to strike.⁴ The question was, should the Holy Allies act in direct hostility against the revolted provinces in South America, would the American government resist them by war? Adams admitted that this question gave him grave concern. This course would commit the United States so far as the President constitutionally could act on this point, and Adams desired that both Houses of Congress pass resolutions to the same effect. But the course would not commit the United States to absolute war, because of the coopération of England with the United States and because the restoration of Spanish rule in South America would not be of any advantage to the allied governments.⁵

¹ Adams, op. cit., vol. vi, pp. 200-201.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 201.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 202.

⁴ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 202.

⁵ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 203.

On November 26, Adams reviewed with the Cabinet the results of the former meetings. The President's message had been presented, expressing general alarm at the situation, censuring European powers for the invasion of Spain, and recognizing Greece as an independent state. Adams suggested a substitute. In case of any issue with the Holy Alliance, it should be on grounds exclusively American; that we should disclaim all interference in European affairs and make the American cause alone supreme; that an answer should be made to the British and Russian communications in the same paper, at the same time stating the attitude of the United States toward the designs of the Holy Alliance upon South America.¹ The only remaining question was whether there would be any advantage in a policy of opposition to the Holy Alliance. Wirt doubted that the country would support the government in a war for the independence of South America.² Calhoun favored action, but feared that the contrast between republican and monarchical principles might be too offensive. An important question was raised by President Monroe. What if England should resist the Allies, should they attack South America, without the aid of the United States? Adams thought England would be victorious, and the probability of English occupation should hasten American action. The proposals of Canning, however, did not contemplate war, and hence there was little danger of it.³ On November 27, President Monroe advised the omission of all paragraphs objected to in the paper. Adams acquiesced, with the exception of the paragraph containing the declaration of principles of the government. This paragraph referred to Liberty, Independence and Peace as the fundamental principles of our government. The object of their exposition was "to compress into one sentence the foundation upon which the mind and heart at once could repose for our justification of the stand we are taking against the Holy Alliance."¹ He argued strenuously with the President to retain the paragraph, but Monroe thought it better omitted because of the circumstances.² He reserved final decision, however.

¹ Adams, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 205.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 205.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 209.

On December 2, 1823, President Monroe delivered his seventh annual message to Congress. This message contained a definite statement of the policy of non-intervention in its extended form, as worked out in the Cabinet meetings immediately preceding the delivery of the message. He first spoke of the arrangement to settle, by amicable negotiation, the disputes between the United States and Russia on the Northwest coast of North America. He took advantage of this opportunity to declare "that the American continents, by a free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers."³ In other words, any further colonization by European nations in the Americas was not to be acquiesced in by the United States. A paragraph was devoted to conditions in Greece, but recognition was not accorded.⁴ After reviewing the intervention in Spain and Portugal, the message expressed the interest of the United States in the countries of Europe, but distinctly stated that American policy was averse to engaging in any of the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves.

¹ Adams, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 211.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 212.

³ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. ii, p. 209.

⁴ Ibid., vol. ii, p. 217.

Only the invasion or the menacing of our rights could secure our participation in a European struggle. But with regard to any movements in the Western hemisphere the policy was reversed. The political systems of the two Continents were different, based upon a difference in government, and what rights had been thus far gained would be scrupulously defended. The time had come to declare that any extension of the European political system to any part of the Western hemisphere would be resisted by the United States. The status quo would be observed as regards existing European dependencies, and there need be no fear of intervention. But where governments had declared and maintained their independence, and it had been acknowledged by the United States, any intervention to oppress or in any way control them would meet the opposition of the United States.¹ A policy of neutrality had been adopted and followed, both in relation to these governments and Spain. Only the security of the United States could cause a change in this policy. The forcible intervention in the internal affairs of Spain raised the question as to what extent such intervention could be carried, on the same principle. This raised the question of legitimacy. The policy of the United States was not to intervene in any of the internal concerns of the powers, and in all cases to recognize the de facto government as the legitimate government and the one with which the United States would deal. This settled the question of recognition of governments and also stated the proposition that the United States would not intervene in other states for rights of succession or for the purpose of determining the legitimacy of governments. But in the American continents, where circumstances were absolutely different, any extension of their political system would endanger the peace of the United States, and the new states would not adopt it voluntarily. Since Spain could not subdue them, the United States had adopted the policy of leaving them to themselves, which policy was commended to the rest of the world.¹ The conditions of peace with Europe were, then: (a) non-intervention in European affairs as regards the United States, and (b) non-intervention in American affairs, as regards the powers of Europe.

¹ Richardson, op. cit., vol. ii, p. 218.

European responsibility was characterized by President Monroe to be of two kinds, non-intervention in the affairs of the independent states of America, and non-colonization in any American territory. The latter was stated in the seventh paragraph of President Monroe's message of December 2, 1823, and has come to be known as the principle of non-colonization. This declaration was occasioned largely by Russian claims to the Northwest, the circumstances of which have already been related. At a Cabinet meeting on June 28, 1823, Adams had stated that the Russian claim could not be admitted as no settlement had been made upon the territory in dispute, except in California, and hence no territorial right could accrue.² The Emperor's ukase of 1821 claimed territorial rights to the fifty-first degree of north latitude, and prohibited foreign navigation and fishing within one hundred Italian miles of the Coast. On July 17, Adams told Baron Tuyl that the United States "should contest the right of Russia to any territorial establishment on this continent, and that we should assume distinctly the principle that the American continents are no longer subjects for any new European colonial establishments."³ Adams addressed a communication to Rush, July 22, 1823, relating to the right of colonization. He denied the claim that the occupation of an island gave a right to the adjoining mainland.¹ He could not conceive of any European nation planting a colony on the northwest coast of America. The ultimate settlement of the country, including an absolute territorial right, was both natural and expected, and had been a subject of Congressional deliberations.² He considered, then the following principles as the settled principles of colonization: the American continents were no longer subjects of colonization; American independent nations possessed rights incident to that condition; the Pacific Ocean was open to the navigation of all nations alike; the rights of interior navigation of their rivers would belong to each of the American nations within its own territories; the United States would not admit the colonial principle of exclusion as applying to any part of the Northwest coast of America, or regard any part of it as belonging to any European nation.³

¹ Richardson, op. cit., vol. iii, p. 219.

² Adams, C. F., Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, vol. vi, p. 157.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 163.

An incident of much significance was the Panama Congress. The governments of Colombia, Mexico and Central America had invited the United States to participate. The motive of American participation was "neither to contract alliances nor to engage in any undertaking or project imparting hostility to any other nation."⁴ President John Quincy Adams declared in a special message to Congress, December 26, 1825, that "an agreement between all the parties represented at the meeting that each will guard by its own means against the establishment of any future European colony within its border may be found advisable."⁵ In his message of March 15, 1826, he stated that

¹ Am. State Papers, Foreign Relations, vol. v, p. 446.

² Ibid., vol. v, p. 447.

³ Ibid., vol. v, p. 447.

⁴ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. ii, p. 417.

⁵ Ibid., vol. ii, p. 417.

most of the new republics had assented to the principle of non-colonization, and that they were considering means of asserting that principle as well as of repelling interference in the affairs of American states.¹ The American delegates to the Congress did not arrive in time to attend the sessions, and the adjourned session did not meet as planned. Doubts as to the aims of Bolivar threw a shadow over the Congress. On April 18, 1826, an important resolution passed the House of Representatives by a lean majority. It was resolved that the United States should be represented at the Panama Congress only in a diplomatic character. No alliance, offensive or defensive, nor any negotiations for such an engagement, should be undertaken with all or with any of the South American republics. No joint declaration should be made regarding interference of European powers with their independence or form of government, nor any compact formed for preventing colonization upon the continent of America. The United States should be left free to act when the crises might arise, as her friendship and interests might at the time demand.² The Panama Congress failed in its immediate purpose, but it clarified the issue raised by Monroe and Adams. The republics to the South recognized the principle of non-intervention and its corollary, the principle of non-colonization. The United States, however, always true to its policy of non-intervention, held itself free from any alliance with the American states, in order to maintain a consistent policy, and in order to be better able to deal with any crisis unhampered by prior engagements.

✓ In discussing the factors leading to and resulting in the extension of the policy of non-intervention, one is impressed by the fact that the extension of the policy was made as the demands arose. The adoption of the policy in the earlier days of the Republic was largely the result of a given set of circumstances requiring definite action upon a policy as regards Europe. The early conception of non-intervention concerned relations exclusively American-European. The first form which the extension of the policy took was resistance to the territorial and commercial aims of the European powers. The independence of the Spanish provinces in South America raised quite another question. Before any further extension of the policy of non-intervention could take place, the United States must settle its own policy as regards the independence of the South American republics. They were ultimately recognized because they had successfully established and maintained their independence, the de facto government being recognized as the legitimate government. Neutrality was impartially observed, and there was no premature recognition. The United States declined to inquire either into the form of government or into the means by which the government had been established. This was later elaborated by Monroe by declaring de facto governments as legitimate as far as the United States was concerned, in contrast with the European intervention in Spain to put down revolution and to determine the form of government.

¹ Richardson, op. cit., vol. ii, p. 334.

² Cong. Debates, 1825-1826, vol. ii, pt. 2, pp. 2369, 2457.

The United States, while avoiding intervention, endeavored to avoid occasion for it and to restore tranquility to the western world by attempting in a conciliatory manner to induce Spain to make peace with Mexico and with the Central and South American governments. On January 20, 1826, Alexander H. Everett, United States Minister to Spain, addressed a lengthy communication to the Duke de Infantado, Spanish Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which he reviewed the history of the Colonial struggle, the attitude of the United States, the depleted condition of Spain, and pleaded for peace between the mother country and the colonies.¹ From the first, it will be remembered that the United States maintained a strict neutrality as between Spain and the colonies. This policy was commended to Russia. Both Great Britain and the United States had taken the ground that they would not interfere with any reconciliation between Spain and her colonies, but both had indicated that they would oppose any interference by a third power to induce the colonies to submit. The efforts of Minister Everett to persuade Spain to recognize their independence were based solely on the fact that their independence was actually achieved, that Spain could not possibly subdue them, and that the continuation of the struggle must be altogether fruitless. As he pointed out, the United States did not depart from its neutral position, even so far as to express an opinion upon the merits of the quarrel; still less did it entertain a thought of active intervention in favor of either party.² But the advantages of peace and commerce were urged upon Spain as adequate compensation for the recognition of the new states.

On different occasions the United States has opposed foreign intervention in Mexico. Henry Clay, as Secretary of State, in instructions to Joel R. Poinsett, Minister to Mexico, on March 25, 1825, declared that the purpose of Poinsett's mission was "to lay, for the first time, the foundations of an intercourse of amity, commerce, navigation, and neighborhood," helpful to both States.³ Poinsett was furnished with full powers to negotiate concerning commerce and navigation.⁴ But he was also instructed to

¹ Am. State papers, For. Rel., vol. vi, pp. 1006-1044.

² Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 1006, 1008, 1009, 1010.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 578.

⁴ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 579.

bring to the notice of the Mexican government the non-colonization principle stated by President Monroe in his message of December 2, 1823, as well as the principle that any attempt by the European Powers to extend their political system to this hemisphere would be dangerous to our peace and safety, and to "urge upon the government of Mexico the utility and expediency of asserting the same principles on all proper occasions." In 1825 the Mexican Secretary of State, Mr. Alaman, brought to the notice of Mr. Poinsett and also to that of Mr. Ward, the British chargé d'affaires, a report from a Mexican agent in Jamaica in regard to the movements of the French fleet in the West Indies. In this report an apprehension was expressed that the French intended to occupy Cuba with a view to eventual military operations against Mexico. Mr. Poinsett assured Mr. Alaman that the United States would not view with indifference the occupation of Cuba by France, especially if it was done with hostile intentions towards Mexico, but hinted that the imprudent conduct of some of the Mexican commanders might have induced Spain to cede the island to the French rather than have it wrested from her as Santa Anna had proposed. It was agreed, however, that Mr. Alaman should address identic notes to Mr. Poinsett and Mr. Ward. These notes, as received, stated that the persons to whom they were addressed had declared not only that their governments never would consent to the interposition of a third power between Spain and her former colonies, but also that the conduct of France constituted such an interposition, and then asked that the matter be brought by them to the notice of their governments in order that the latter might demand of France such explanations as the case required. Mr. Poinsett objected to these statements on the ground that the friendly disposition of the United States towards the Spanish-American countries did not confer upon Mexico the privilege of demanding the interference of the United States as a right. The notes were altered so as to meet this objection, and were then answered both by Mr. Poinsett and by Mr. Ward in the sense of the assurance which Mr. Poinsett had previously given to Mr. Alaman as to the attitude of the United States.¹ Mr. Clay subsequently complained that, when questions of commerce were involved, Mexico treated the United States as a European rather than as an American nation, but that, when Mexican independence was menaced by Europe, the government appealed to fraternal sympathies which were supposed to spring from the United States, as a member of the American family. This comment related to the proposed insertion by Mexico in a commercial treaty with the United States of an exception in favor of nations that were formerly Spanish possessions. Mr. Clay observed that the United States had asked only equality and reciprocity, and could consent to no other basis of negotiation.²

The proposed interventions by European nations in Mexico during the years 1858-60 were firmly and consistently opposed by the United States. A report reached the United States in 1858 that Spain was preparing to send a military and naval force to Mexico in order to obtain political ascendancy there by taking advantage of Mexico's unfortunate internal condition. The American minister at Madrid, Mr. Dodge, was instructed incidentally to remind the Spanish minister of foreign affairs of the interest of the United States in the subject. With respect to the causes of war between Spain and Mexico, Mr. Dodge was advised that the United States had no concern. It did not undertake to judge those causes, or claim to interpose in any hostilities that might take place; its "policy of observation and interference" was "limited to the permanent subjugation of any portion of the territory of Mexico, or of any other American state to any European power whatever."¹ Mr. Tassara, Spanish minister to the United States, informed the government that the naval force had been ordered to Mexican waters only for the protection of the persons and property of Spanish subjects resident in Mexico and to compel justice from Mexico for injuries which had been committed. This explanation was satisfactory, but the American policy was again stated to the Spanish government. Later, the naval forces of the United States in Mexican waters were increased to protect American rights and interests. The Spanish fleet had been ordered to Vera Cruz to attack the city in case the Juarez government did not comply with certain demands. The American fleet was directed not to resist the Spanish fleet if war measures were adopted. Secretary of State Cass declared to the Spanish minister that the United States was utterly opposed to the holding of Mexico by any foreign power, as well as to any forcible interference with a view to control of Mexico's political destiny, and that any measures taken for such objects the United States would resist "by all the means in their power." The American minister at Madrid was directed to suggest to the Spanish government that it would be desirable to avert the impending struggle, if possible, by peaceable means.²

¹ Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. v, pp. 908-910.

² Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 582-583.

Great Britain also made plans to intervene in Mexico. On the strength of a statement by the British consul at Vera Cruz that the British government had determined to enforce the payment by the Liberal Government, then at

¹ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, pp. 477, 478.

² Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 478, 480-481.

Vera Cruz, of certain British claims against Mexico, Secretary of State Cass on May 12, 1859, instructed Mr. Dallas, then American minister at London, in case the consul's announcement should prove to be true, to say that while the United States did not undertake to sit in judgment on the difficulties between Great Britain and Mexico or on the measures adopted to bring about a settlement of them, yet the relations of the United States and Mexico were for political as well as for geographical and commercial reasons, of vital interest to the United States, that the Liberal party was thought by the President to be the best means of consolidating power in Mexico, and that an attack on Vera Cruz would probably result in great injury to the general interest.¹ The British government therefore was asked to reconsider its decision to use force.

In July 1860, Lord Lyons, then British minister at Washington, invited the United States to join France and Great Britain in an effort to induce the Miramon and Juarez governments to end their struggles for power, by calling a national assembly. It was declared that the general policy of the United States was "opposed to any interference, especially the joint interference, of other powers in the domestic affairs of an independent nation."² The Juarez government had been recognized by the United States, and joint intervention, the President thought, would do no practical good. Even when all designs to intervene by force in order to influence the Mexican government by any means except friendly were disavowed, the President refused to consider a departure from our established policy. The French government made a similar representation to the United States, disclaiming the intent to use force, but reserving the right to use such measures as were expedient if the rights of French citizens in Mexico were violated.¹ Mr. Cass replied that the permanent occupation of any part of the territory of Mexico by a foreign power, any forcible attempt to intervene in its internal affairs or to control it politically would greatly offend the United States. Mr. Cass reviewed the situation in a note to Mr. McLane, minister to Mexico, September 20, 1860. The governments of England, France, and Spain had disavowed all designs to do anything against the policy of the United States.² The United States would not oppose any effort to bring the contending parties together, if the plan be honestly carried out, but the non-intervention policy of the country prevented any direct participation in the arrangement. Mr. McLane feared that the European powers would use this as a means of securing political control.³ Mr. Cass did not share this view, but made it clear that any such attempt would meet the armed opposition of the United States.

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 479.

² Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 479-480.

Resistance to threatened European intervention in Mexico was not the only difficulty experienced by the United States with the southern republic during President Buchanan's administration. The question of American intervention was equally vexing to the government at Washington, and led to strong representations by the President to Congress in several annual messages. Incessant civil strife and a hopeless state of anarchy had, he declared, rendered the adequate protection of American citizens impossible; American claims and remonstrances against grievances had passed unnoticed; and confiscatory decrees had been promulgated. These conditions led to the withdrawal of the American legion from Mexico, and to the suggestion by the President of the establishment of a temporary protectorate over the northern portion of the Mexican States of Chihuahua and Sonora. The President regarded it as his duty to protect Mexican territory against hostile interference by other powers.¹ A special agent, dispatched to Mexico with discretionary powers, accorded recognition to the Juarez government, but outrages against American citizens continued.² Intervention was again suggested as the only effective remedial measure, in concert with the "constitutional" government of Mexico. Such a course was justified by the President in the following terms:

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 480.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 481.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 482.

It may be said that these measures will, at least, indirectly, be consistent with our wise and settled policy not to interfere in the domestic concerns of foreign nations. But does not the present constitute an exception? An adjoining republic is in a state of anarchy and confusion from which she has proved wholly unable to extricate herself. She is entirely destitute of the power to maintain peace upon her own borders or to prevent the incursions of bandits into our territory. In her fate and in her fortune, in her power to establish and maintain a settled government, we have a far deeper interest socially, commercially and politically, than any other nation. She is now a wreck upon the ocean, drifting about as she is impelled by different factions. As a good neighbor, shall we not extend to her a helping hand to save her? If we do not, it would not be surprising should some other nation undertake the task, and thus force us to interfere at last, under circumstances of increased difficulty, for the maintenance of our established policy.³

In his last annual message, President Buchanan again reviewed relations with Mexico, contending that the risk ¹Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. v, pp. 512-514.

²*Ibid.*, vol. v, p. 564.

³*Ibid.*, vol. v, p. 568.

attending the removal of the cause for European intervention was preferable to the risk attending the continuance of the danger.¹ Congress, however, refused to accept his proposal. Injured American citizens awaited the slow process of treaty negotiation to secure a redress of grievances.

Definite plans by European powers for reprisals against Mexico were already under way. In a joint note of November 30, 1861, the Spanish, French and British governments declared their intention to intervene in Mexico in order to secure a redress of grievances and to insure the protection of foreign residents. They agreed that no Mexican territory would be taken, nor would they interfere coercively with the form of the Mexican government. The aggrieved governments invited the United States to join them, but they refused to allow their purpose to be defeated by delay.² The United States, while referring to its attempts to aid Mexico in meeting foreign claims, refused to take part in the intervention, for the following reasons:

Max
Episcopo

First, the United States, so far as is practicable, prefers to adhere to a traditional policy recommended to them by the father of their country, and confirmed by a happy experience, which forbids them from making alliances with foreign nations; second, Mexico being a neighbor of the United States in this continent, and possessing a system of government similar to our own in many of its important features, the United States habitually cherish a decided good will towards that republic, and a lively interest in its security, prosperity, and welfare.³

The forces of the allied governments seized Vera Cruz in 1861; but the British and Spanish forces were withdrawn in April, 1862. Both those governments were dissatisfied with the course of France. Moreover, Mr. Seward, as Secretary of State of the United States, in a series of notes protested against any policy of permanent intervention in Mexican affairs, and insisted that recognition by the United States of the government of Maximilian, which France had set up, must await the choice and act of the Mexican people.¹ He also peremptorily remonstrated against an Austrian proposal to aid the French, and the project was definitely abandoned by the Austrian government.² The protestations of the French government that it did not aim at the acquisition of territory or at the setting up of a form of government different from that which the Mexicans desired, and that the satisfaction of existing "grievs" and the establishment of a responsible government were all that it desired, were accepted,³ but only so long as was necessary. The formal acceptance by the Archduke Maximilian of the imperial crown on April 10, 1864, led the House of Representatives unanimously to resolve:

¹ Richardson, op. cit., vol. ii, pp. 645-646.

² 52 Br. and For. State Papers, p. 394.

³ 52 Br. and For. State Papers, pp. 396-397.

The Congress of the United States are unwilling by silence to have the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators to the deplorable events now transpiring in the republic of Mexico, and they think fit to declare that it does not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge any monarchical government in America under the auspices of any European power.⁴

No sooner was the burden of the Civil War lifted, than

¹ H. Ex. Doc. 100, 37 Cong. 2 Sess., p. 217; Diplomatic Correspondence, 1863, vol. ii, pp. 783, 799.

² Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, pp. 505, 506.

³ Diplomatic Correspondence, 1862, pp. 354-355, 377, 404.

⁴ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 496.

Seward complained of continued foreign military rule against the will of the Mexican people.¹ He demanded the withdrawal of French troops, and the observance by France of the principle of non-intervention as regards Mexico.² He virtually threatened war, unless France should comply, and an agreement for the gradual withdrawal of the French forces was reached.³ The United States, in insisting upon the removal of a cause of intervention, reaffirmed its own continued adhesion to the non-intervention principle.⁴ Mexico City was evacuated by the French in February 1867, and the government of Maximilian was left to the only test consistent with American policy—the will of the Mexican people.

Next to Mexico, Venezuela has caused the United States the most concern in the maintenance of the principle of non-intervention. In a controversy between the Venezuelan and Spanish governments, the former requested the interposition of the United States. Secretary of State Cass, in a note to General Paez, the Venezuelan Minister at Washington, November 5, 1860, replied that the established policy of the United States forbade interference "with the relations of foreign nations to each other," and that it was "both improper and impossible" for the United States to decide upon the course of conduct towards Venezuela which Spain might think "her honor and her interests" required her to take. But the minister of the United States at Madrid was instructed to tender his "good offices" to the governments of Spain and Venezuela if a favorable opportunity should arise.⁵

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. vi, pp. 499-500.

² H. Ex. Doc. 73, 39 Cong. 1 Sess., pt. 2, p. 348.

³ Diplomatic Correspondence, 1866, vol. i, p. 378.

⁴ Ibid., 1866, vol. i, p. 378.

⁵ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 530.

On two different occasions the United States refused to be a party to joint action against Venezuela to secure a more strict observance of the engagements of that country. In June 1871, Baron Gerolt, German Minister at Washington, confidentially sounded the Secretary of State, Hamilton Fish, as to how the United States would receive a proposal, which the German government had already addressed to Great Britain, Spain, Italy and Denmark, the purpose of which was to inaugurate a joint and concerted movement to urge upon Venezuela the maintenance of a more stable government and the stricter observance of her engagements.¹ Mr. Fish could not discover that Germany was among the creditors of Venezuela, nor did he know of any grievances of Germany against Venezuela, and he was consequently surprised at the inquiry. Baron Gerolt was reminded of the combined movement against Mexico and its consequences. The United States, said Mr. Fish, if Germany or any other power had just cause of war against Venezuela, could not object to a resort to that measure; but the United States could not look with indifference on any combination of European powers against an American state. If what was desired was a united remonstrance against anarchy or a chronic revolutionary condition, or appeal to honesty in the observance of engagements, the United States, while declining to take part in joint representation, would itself make an independent but similar remonstrance and appeal. In conformity with these views, Mr. Fish instructed General Schenck, then American minister in London, on June 2, 1871, to inquire of the British government as to its intentions, and to urge that the matter be settled by pacific means.²

Fifteen years later, the American minister at Caracas,

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. vi, p. 531.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 532.

after a conversation with the British minister at the capital, suggested a "joint representation" and "joint cooperation" by the two governments for the purpose of securing a settlement of British and American claims. Mr. Bayard, as Secretary of State, replied that the policy of the United States was "distinctly opposed to joint action with other powers in the presentation of claims, even when they may arise from an act equally invading the common rights of American citizens and the subjects of another state residing in the country to whose government complaint is made."¹ A coincident and even identical representation might be made regarding matters of common interest to the powers, but a joint presentation was a different matter. A truly joint demand might involve a joint enforcement, which would be inconsistent with American policy. An American minister might, said Mr. Bayard, act "in concert" with his colleagues to secure the benefits of co-operative action, but the United States was not disposed to risk the embarrassments which united action might entail.²

Perhaps the most serious instance in which the United States felt called upon to assert and maintain the principle of non-intervention was the boundary dispute between Venezuela and British Guiana. It was essentially a case of protecting, if not guaranteeing, the territorial integrity of an American state against the claims of a power of Europe holding a colony contiguous to the American state. Repeated efforts by the United States to secure an amicable settlement between Great Britain and Venezuela had failed. The question engaged the attention of Presidents Harrison and Cleveland in their annual messages, and of Congress in the form of a joint resolution.³

Venez
boundary

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. vi, pp. 532, 533.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 533.

³ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. ix, pp. 181, 441, 526; Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 535.

On July 20, 1895, Mr. Olney, as Secretary of State, addressed instructions to Mr. Bayard, then American ambassador to Great Britain, covering the American view of the subject.¹ These instructions dealt with the history of the boundary question; the efforts of Venezuela to secure an arbitral settlement and Great Britain's refusal to agree; the efforts of the United States to secure an amicable solution; and the future policy of the United States with regard to the threatened aggressions of Great Britain. The main question, Mr. Olney contended, was whether or not any right or duty devolved upon the United States to interfere to protect Venezuelan territorial integrity. The general principle of intervention was not invoked to justify American action, but reliance was placed on the peculiarly and distinctively American character of the question. History, geography and similarity in forms of government were cited as reasons for American interest in Latin-American states. This interest was further justified on grounds of power, for "Today the United States," wrote Mr. Olney, "is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition." In the view of the government of the United States, the dispute involved the acquisition and extension of political control. Great Britain was regarded as a state of Europe in respect to its American possessions; for any other construction would allow the indefinite extension of European-owned territory in America. Unrestricted arbitration was demanded as the only means of reaching a just settlement, in place of the British proposal for restricted arbitration.

Lord Salisbury, on November 26, 1895, emphatically contested the validity of the contentions advanced by Mr.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1895, vol. i, pp. 545-562.

Olney.¹ While admitting the justification of the American policy at the time of its adoption and of the adhesion of Great Britain to it, he denied its application to the Venezuelan controversy. The dispute was, he maintained, only the determination of the frontier of a British possession owned by Great Britain before Venezuela became an independent state. As the United States did not control the conduct of South American states, it was pointed out that no right existed to protect them from the consequences of their misconduct towards other nations. The demand for unrestricted arbitration was rejected. The parties whose claims were at issue were alone regarded as competent to settle the dispute. The Monroe declaration was denied a place in the code of international law, and the claim of American interest in anything concerning a Latin-American state merely because of geographical situation, was definitely rejected.

President Cleveland, in a special message to Congress, December 17, 1895, declared that the Monroe declaration applied to every stage of our national life, as did the balance of power to the old, and that its maintenance was essential to the peace and safety of the United States.² He asked for authority to appoint a commission to determine the correct boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana, and took the ground that, when the line had been so determined, any attempt by Great Britain to appropriate territory beyond that line should be resisted as a wilful aggression on the rights of the United States. Congress promptly complied with the President's request, and a commission was duly appointed, with Justice David J. Brewer as president. The commission, however, found itself helpless to proceed without evidence from British as well as from Venezuelan sources. To meet this difficulty, Justice Brewer wrote a letter to Mr. Olney, requesting that both interested parties place at the disposal of the commission such documentary, historical, unpublished or other evidence as either possessed or controlled;¹ and he further suggested that an agent or attorney representing the conflicting interests would be welcome to aid in the submission of proofs. Justice Brewer observed that it would not be of advantage to any party "that the machinery devised by the government of the United States to secure the desired information should fail in its purpose." His letter was communicated to the British foreign office² and Lord Salisbury made a favorable response; but the commission never made a report. On the other hand, a treaty of arbitration, signed at Washington, February 2, 1897, between Great Britain and Venezuela, ended the controversy between Great Britain and the United States.³ The arbitral tribunal consisted of Chief Justice Fuller, Mr. Justice Brewer, Lord Herschell, and Sir Richard Collins, with F. de Martens as president. It rendered its award at Paris on October 3, 1899.⁴

¹ Foreign Relations, 1895, vol. i, pp. 563-567.

² Foreign Relations, 1895, vol. i, pp. 542-543.

In the final settlement of the contested boundary line, possession was accepted as the determining factor.⁵ Prescription is one of the recognized sources of title to territory, but no precise period of time has been fixed by international law on the expiration of which the principle must be held to operate. In the present instance, the treaty of

¹ Foreign Relations, 1895, vol. i, p. 576.

² Ibid., 1895, vol. i, p. 576.

³ Ibid., 1896, p. lxxi.

⁴ Ibid., 1899, p. xxxii.

⁵ Ibid., 1896, p. 254.

arbitration provides that adverse holding for a period of fifty years was to be regarded as conferring title. Exclusive political control as well as actual settlement of a district was construed as constituting title by prescription. International law was to govern wherever the rule fixed by the treaty was inapplicable. Under the award Great Britain continued to hold a large part of the disputed territory in the interior, while Venezuela retained control of the mouths of the Orinoco, including Barima Point and the Caribbean littoral for some distance eastward. President Cleveland reported to Congress that the award was satisfactory to both parties, and that the dispute was definitely ended. By the incorporation of the principle of prescription in the terms of the treaty of arbitration, a large portion of the Venezuelan claims was relinquished. The active interest of the United States ceased upon the agreement of the parties to enter into a treaty of arbitration.

Another Venezuelan controversy causing the United States concern was the armed intervention of Germany, Great Britain and Italy in 1902-1903, for the collection of claims. Germany complained of the non-performance of engagements in connection with the building of a railway and of the non-satisfaction of claims arising out of damages suffered by German merchants and land-owners during the Venezuelan Civil Wars of 1898-1900.¹ A six-months' term was fixed during which no claims would be entertained by the Venezuelan government; and a decree was issued establishing a purely Venezuelan commission to determine the claims, which were required to be presented within three months.² Responsibility for claims before a certain date was disavowed; diplomatic protests were to be ignored; only appeals to the Venezuelan Supreme Court of Justice were to be allowed; and payment was to be made in bonds of a newly emitted revolution debt. After repeated refusals of offers to arbitrate, Germany decided once more to demand a settlement, and in case of refusal to use coercion. Assurances were given to the United States that Germany desired only to secure justice for her injured citizens, and that under no circumstances was the acquisition or permanent occupation of any territory considered.¹ President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress of December 3, 1901, declared that the United States did not "guarantee any state against punishment if it misconducts itself, provided that punishment does not take the form of the acquisition of territory by any non-American power."² The government was satisfied with the assurance of the German government that no territory would be taken, and would await the actual appearance of ulterior designs before taking any kind of action. The measures suggested by the German government were the blockade of the harbors of La Guayra and Porto Cabello, and in case this coercive measure failed, the temporary occupation of the Venezuelan ports and the levying of duties.³ On July 29, 1902, the British government warned the Venezuelan government that unless the claimants of British nationality should be paid what was justly due them, the British government would take steps to compel payment.⁴

¹ Foreign Relations, 1901, p. 193.

² Ibid., 1901, p. 193.

After the German demand of December 7, 1902, England, Germany and Italy agreed upon certain reprisals against Venezuela. Some war vessels were seized, Porto Cabello was bombarded and a Venezuelan port was shelled. Venezuela was forced to yield, and the United States was

¹ Foreign Relations, 1901, p. 194.

² Ibid., 1901, p. 195.

³ Ibid., 1901, p. 194.

⁴ Hart, Monroe Doctrine, p. 230.

requested to convey to the blockading governments a proposal of arbitration.¹ Full authority was conferred on the American minister at Caracas to act. Arbitration was accepted by Germany and Great Britain with important reservations, and President Roosevelt was invited to act as arbitrator. The Hague Tribunal was ultimately agreed upon as the arbitrator of the question of preferential payment alone, as the claims with the exception of the British and German reservations were referred to mixed commissions.² The question of preferential payment was decided in favor of the blockading governments on February 22, 1904.³

The policy of the United States in this instance was guided by the assurance that the acquisition of territory neither was contemplated nor would under any circumstances be considered. November 11, 1902, Mr. Hay told Sir Michael Herbert, the British ambassador at Washington, that while the United States government regretted the use of force against Central and South American countries, yet no objection could be made against steps taken to secure the redress of injuries suffered by the subjects of the European powers concerned, where the question of territory was not included.⁴ The Argentine minister of foreign relations, Dr. Drago, communicated certain views to the United States government. In this communication he took the ground that proceedings for the execution of a judgment against a state could not be instituted; that a sovereign state had the right to determine the time and mode of payment; that ability to pay often must await increase in wealth; that the collection of loans by military means implied territorial occupation to make them effective;

¹ Foreign Relations, 1903, pp. 420, 453.

² Ibid., 1903, pp. 425-426; 439-440; 477-478.

³ Moore, Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 591.

⁴ Ibid., vol. vi, p. 592.

and that the South American nations, while not exempt from the obligations of states under international law, should insist on the principle that the public debt of a country could not occasion armed intervention nor even the actual occupation of the territory of American nations by a European power.¹ In reply, Mr. Hay, Secretary of State, referred to President Roosevelt's message of December 3, 1901, in which he declared no guarantee against punishment could be given to any state misconducting itself.² The question of territory was excepted by Mr. Hay. The Argentine government was informed that the United States strongly favored the reference of all claims by one state against another growing out of individual wrongs or national obligations to an impartial tribunal. This was broader than the Drago proposal, which referred to public debts alone. The United States, however, did not agree to protect any country where the collection of claims only was contemplated, and armed intervention by three European powers in an American state actually took place, with the knowledge and without the objection of the government of the United States.

Our relations with Brazil afford one instance of non-intervention and one instance of intervention on the part of the United States. Just as Mexico had called upon the United States for aid against probable French invasion, and Venezuela against Spain, so Brazil called upon the United States for aid against Portugal. The chargé d'affaires of Brazil in the year 1825 suggested the formation by the United States of an alliance with Brazil to maintain the latter's independence, should Portugal receive the aid of any foreign power, and also the conclusion of an alliance to expel the Portuguese from any part of Brazil which might fall into their hands.¹ Mr. Clay replied that the prospects of a speedy peace between Brazil and Portugal seemed to remove the necessity of an alliance, but intimated that, if the independence of American States should again be threatened by the European allies, the President would take appropriate action. But he also indicated that an alliance with Brazil against Portugal would be a violation of the policy of the United States, for "whilst the war is confined to the parent country and its former colony, the United States remain neutral, extending their friendship and doing equal justice to both parties."²

¹*Foreign Relations*, 1903, pp. 1-5.

²*Ibid.*, 1903, p. 5.

Another case in which the question of American intervention arose was the Brazilian naval revolt during the years 1893-1894. The revolt of the naval vessels under Admiral Mello was followed by an attack on Rio de Janeiro, resulting in the declaration of martial law, the suspension of all trade and commerce, the death of many non-combatants, and the destruction of property. The insurgents professed to set up a provisional government, and asked for its recognition by the United States and other foreign powers. The Brazilian government, on the other hand, issued a decree placing the revolting squadron outside the protection of the national flag.³ Mr. Thompson, the American minister of Brazil, was instructed to take steps to insure the protection of American interests.⁴ The diplomatic representatives of several foreign governments observed the practice of non-intervention in Brazil internal affairs, but they strongly insisted that the insurgent admiral be deprived of all pretext for hostile action. The allied naval commanders informed Admiral Mello that they would oppose

¹ Moore, Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 437.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 437.

³ Foreign Relations, 1893, pp. 59-60.

⁴ Ibid., 1893, p. 47.

by force, if necessary, all attacks upon the city (Rio de Janeiro), and further insisted that insurgent interference with commerce should be limited to the lines of fire of the batteries of the land fortifications.¹ Definite instructions were sent by Secretary of State Gresham to Mr. Thompson, a summary of which follows:

1. That, an actual condition of hostilities existing, the right of the insurgents to carry on orderly military operations was admitted.

2. That the denial of this right by a foreign power would have constituted an act of intervention, incompatible with neutral duty.

3. That, in view of the creation of fortified and armed strategic positions within the limits of the city, the foreign naval forces would not be justified in forcibly preventing its bombardment.

4. That, while "an announced and effective blockade," enforcement of which would have necessarily involved the right to extend operations to the high seas, would be recognized, the insurgents would not be permitted, after they had allowed foreign commerce to enter the port, to seek to accomplish the objects of a blockade either by seizing particular vessels or by firing upon them when they were engaged in discharging or receiving cargo.²

Admiral Benham, commander of the American naval force, informed the insurgents and the city that American vessels would be forcibly protected.³ The Detroit was ordered to fire back if merchant vessels were fired upon. An insurgent vessel fired upon, but missed, an American vessel, and the Detroit returned the fire. This was followed by an exchange of shots, together with a threat by the commander of the Detroit that the insurgent vessel would be sunk in case of further hostilities. Admiral Benham stated that he had not interfered with the military or naval operations of either side, but had limited action to the protection of American citizens and commerce. American vessels in the line of fire during legitimate hostilities were operating at their peril, he declared, while merchant vessels were entitled to freedom of movement elsewhere. The search of neutral vessels, or the seizure of cargoes amounting to contraband of war in case of war between two independent governments was denied to the insurgents, on the grounds that forcible seizure by those not enjoying a status of belligerency would constitute an act of piracy. Mr. Gresham held that Mr. Thompson had acted within his instructions.¹

¹ Foreign Relations, 1893, pp. 56, 95-96.

² Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. ii, p. 1114.

³ Foreign Relations, 1893, pp. 116-117.

Mr. Gresham's approval of Admiral Benham's course seemingly sanctions several misconceptions which should not pass unnoticed. Admiral Benham's communication to Admiral da Gama was clearly a denial of the right of the insurgent party to prevent the supply of contraband to the city and to the federal government. The protection of commerce, and the prevention of fire upon the seizure of innocent neutral ships were within the rights of Admiral Benham. But his denial of the right to prevent the supply of contraband was a direct intervention in the conflict between the insurgents and the Brazilian federal government, and operated to the disadvantage of the former. This was a course which he had no right to take, either under his instructions or under international law. Mr. Gresham's instructions to Mr. Thompson recognized the existence of a state of hostilities and the right of the insurgents to carry on military operations. They therefore had the right to prevent the delivery of arms and munitions of war to the federal forces, as orderly military operations include the crippling of the enemy by all fair means. The duties of neutral governments and of individuals with respect to contraband were evidently confused in this case. Contraband trade is prohibited to individuals, but the duty to enforce this prohibition does not rest on neutral governments. A private citizen supplying war materials to either party to an armed conflict is guilty of an unneutral act. But he commits it at his own risk; and if his government should assume to protect him in it, it would make itself a party to his unneutrality.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1893, p. 117.

The Department of State inquired as to the attempted blockade of the port by the insurgents, and intimated that the test of the blockade would be its effectiveness. This substantially recognized the possibility of a legal blockade, which, if it was established, would gain for the insurgents the rights of belligerents. The denial of the right to prevent the supply of contraband constituted a very effective limitation of the power of the insurgents to make their blockade effective, and had the effectiveness of the blockade depended wholly on this, Admiral Benham's position would have made impossible the very thing which the Department of State admitted the insurgents had a legal right to do. The action of the American naval force had, indeed, broken the attempted blockade.

Until insurgents are recognized as belligerents, the titular government continues to be prima facie responsible for the proper treatment of foreigners within its jurisdiction. Other governments have no right to assume the responsibilities of the titular government in this respect, in the absence of any necessity for self defence, to which acts of interference are expressly limited. The recognition of belligerency, or the withholding of belligerent rights should not be confused with the duty of neutral governments in relation to parties in a civil conflict where one is a titular government and another is a contesting insurgent. Recognition of the insurgents as belligerents was denied by Mr. Gresham, on the ground that it would be an act of unfriendliness towards the titular government and would give moral support to the rebellion, since evidence was lacking of the stability and effectiveness of the insurgent resistance to the titular government.¹ This denial, however, did not give the United States the right to resist the movements of the insurgent forces, nor did it justify Admiral Benham's denouncement of the prevention of the supply of contraband as an act of piracy. Admission by neutrals of the right of insurgents to commit hostile acts against a titular government carries with it the duty of non-intervention, and is in no way connected with the according or withholding of belligerent rights.

The relations of the United States with the Argentine Republic furnish two illustrations of the application of the policy of non-intervention, and one example of intervention when American interests require it. The first of these was an attempt of South American countries to secure the intervention of the United States in their internal affairs, within a few years following the publication of the Monroe message. An inquiry having been made by the Argentine Republic as to the scope of the Monroe declaration, Mr. Clay, who was then Secretary of State, replied that it was leveled at apprehended European interference in the affairs of American republics, and that, while it would doubtless receive the sanction of Congress, it was purely a voluntary executive declaration, and did not pledge the United States to any obligation the performance of which might be demanded by foreign governments.¹ Should the question again arise, Congress alone could determine whether or not the country would engage in war. The war between the Argentine Republic and the Emperor of Brazil was a purely American war, which presented no analogy whatsoever to the situation described by President Monroe. Even if Brazil had remained under Portuguese dominion, the war with Argentina would not have come within the purview of Mr. Monroe's declaration.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1893, p. 63.

On January 26, 1832, Mr. Livingston, as Secretary of State, gave Mr. Baylies, chargé d'affaires of the United States at Buenos Aires, instructions relative to American complaints against that government. It was stated that one Lewis Vernet, who had formed an establishment at Soledad, one of the Falkland Islands, had captured three American vessels,—the Breakwater, the Harriet, and the Superior—pretending that they had violated some unknown laws of the republic of Buenos Aires, for the protection of fisheries.² Two of the vessels were appropriated by Vernet without any trial, and were fitted out to make further aggressions on the property of American citizens engaged in lawful commerce in the seas around those islands. These acts were, said Mr. Livingston, regarded as "lawless and piratical."³ Mr. Baylies was instructed to secure recognition of American fishery rights, and if Vernet's acts were avowed, to justify the recapture of the vessels taken, and to demand their restitution, if not taken on the grounds of the irregularity of proceedings; but if the acts should be disavowed, orders should be given to the squadron to break up the settlement and bring Vernet to Buenos Aires for trial.⁴ On February 14, 1832, Mr.

¹ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 434.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 876.

³ Ibid., vol. i, p. 877.

⁴ Ibid., vol. i, p. 883.

Livingston again sent instructions making further charges against Vernet's conduct. The colony was one composed of deserters from American ships and renegades from all nations, governed only by the will of Vernet. It was a necessary act of self-defence to break up this settlement, whether the government of Buenos Aires had or had not a title to the jurisdiction of the islands; and in any event, the right of fishery could not be interfered with.¹ In answer to the protest of the American consul against the seizure of American vessels, the Argentine minister of foreign affairs had justified the acts of Vernet as legal.² The operations of Vernet were forcibly suppressed by the American warship Lexington, under the command of Captain Duncan. In reply to the demands of Mr. Baylies, the government of Buenos Aires not only refused indemnity for Vernet's acts but demanded reparation for the acts of Captain Duncan. After this, Mr. Baylies demanded his passports.³

At bottom, this controversy involved the question of the validity of the claim of Buenos Aires to title to the Falkland Islands. On this ground Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, on December 4, 1841, declined to pursue the discussion of the complaints made against the course of Captain Duncan until the question of jurisdiction over the islands, as between Great Britain and Buenos Aires, should be settled.⁴ Mr. Bayard, as Secretary of State, on March 18, 1886, took similar ground.⁵ As the British reoccupation of the islands in 1833 was based on a claim of title asserted and maintained before the declaration of President Monroe,

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. i, p. 884.

² Br. and Fr. State Papers, vol. xx, pp. 316-317.

³ Ibid., vol. xx, pp. 369, 437.

⁴ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. i, p. 888.

⁵ Ibid., vol. i, p. 889.

that declaration, which Buenos Aires had invoked, was held by the United States to be inapplicable to the case.¹ But the United States also maintained that, even if Great Britain had violated the Monroe principle, this would not give another government the right to demand from the United States redress for injuries alleged to have resulted from its failure to act. The United States further contended that there was ample justification for putting an end to Vernet's operations, even if the claim of Buenos Aires to sovereignty over the islands were admitted. From this review, it appears that the United States maintained, in the Falkland Islands affair, the following positions: (1) that, where a dispute as to title antedated the Monroe message, the United States did not regard itself as being called upon to interfere; (2) that the Monroe declaration did not, in the opinion of the United States, operate retroactively; (3) that another government could not as of right demand that the United States enforce the Monroe declaration, or demand redress for injuries sustained as the result of inaction by the United States; (4) that the United States had, as an independent nation, the right to abate a nuisance involving lawless aggressions upon the persons and property of its citizens, without regard to the question of territorial jurisdiction.

In reply to a suggestion, in 1898, that the United States should join Germany and Great Britain in representations to the Argentine government in relation to its alleged refusal to proceed with the arbitration of the boundary dispute with Chile, the Department of State observed that the fact that the queen of Great Britain had already been chosen as arbitrator would probably stand in the way of joint representations by Great Britain and Germany; but the Department added that it did not wish to appear as opposing any suggestion of arbitration, when "made benevolently and not in the form of intervention, joint or otherwise, inconsistent with the independence of the nation to which it was addressed."¹ A tender of good offices had already been made by the United States to Argentina and Chile.

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. i, p. 890.

The relations of the United States with Chile reveal two cases where the principle of non-intervention was at first disregarded, but later applied. The first was the controversy over asylum and safe-conduct during the civil war following the dispute between President Balmaceda and the Chilean congress. Many persons sought refuge at the various legations. Even prior to the resignation of Balmaceda, Mr. Patrick Egan, then American minister at Santiago, was threatened with police inspection for harboring Congressionalists. During the year 1891, when many persons were seeking asylum, the Chilean government, claiming that the privilege of asylum was being abused, began to police the American legation. Mr. Egan protested vigorously, and declared that he would permit his refugees to leave the legation only under proper safe-conduct to neutral territory.² He repeatedly demanded safe-conduct for the people at his legation, but without result.³ The State Department instructed him to report the facts of the situation, to learn the practices of other states and to prevent the abuse of the privilege of asylum.⁴ Mr. Egan argued with Señor Matta that his house was an integral part of the territory of the United States, and that, without the will and permission of that government, Chile could not consider as subject to her judicial action persons clearly beyond her jurisdiction. He also contended that the grant

¹ Moore, Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 435.

² Foreign Relations, 1891, p. 166.

³ Ibid., pp. 166, 177, 184, 185.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 167, 177, 178, 179.

of safe-conduct to harbored refugees was ordinary Chilean practice. Señor Matta would admit the extraterritoriality of the minister's domicile, and the attendant right of asylum, but the granting of safe-conduct, he held, was only a matter of courtesy.¹

This unwarranted extension of extraterritorial privileges, resulting in the defeat of justice and the crippling of the administration of extradition, was reasserted by Mr. Egan in 1893, during a new uprising of the Balmaceda party. The leaders of the movement, Colonel Fuentes and Señor Blanlot-Halley, were received by Mr. Egan at the American legation, and safe-conduct was requested for them.² Mr. Gresham, who was then Secretary of State, after learning that the men were wanted for "murder and robbery," and that a regular trial would be afforded them, notified Mr. Egan that he had no authority to protect Chileans against police officers who were bound to arrest them for violation of the laws of their country, and instructed him to cease harboring them if they were demanded by the Chilean government on a criminal charge.³ On April 18, 1893, Mr. Gresham instructed that the criminals be ordered to leave the legation.⁴ Mr. Cleveland in his annual message, December 4, 1893, completely disavowed the act of Mr. Egan as unauthorized by the government, not sanctioned by international precedent, and provocative of strife and sedition, adding that "under no circumstances can the representatives of this government be permitted, under the ill-defined fiction of extraterritoriality, to interrupt the administration of criminal justice in the countries to which they are accredited."⁵

¹ Foreign Relations, p. 195.

² Ibid., 1893, pp. 217, 218.

³ Ibid., pp. 219, 220.

⁴ Ibid., p. 221.

⁵ Ibid., 1893, p. iv.

The attempted intervention by Mr. Blaine, as Secretary of State, in the Chile-Peruvian war in 1881, and the subsequent reversion to the policy of non-intervention by his successor, Mr. Frelinghuysen, exemplify in a striking way how deeply intrenched the policy of non-intervention had become. The dispute between Chile and Peru related to territorial rights over the seaboard of Atacama, which led to the Chile-Bolivian conflict of 1879, and to the subsequent entry of Peru into the conflict. This comparatively insignificant region became famous in 1841 because of the discovery of vast guano deposits. While Chilean jurisdiction had been generally recognized, Bolivian claims of jurisdiction extending southward to the Salado river formed a serious complication. Chile's strong denial of the Bolivian claims threatened war, but Spanish aggressions on the west coast of South America stayed the immediate drift towards hostilities. The treaties of 1866 and 1874 between Chile and Bolivia were aimed at an amicable settlement. The secret compact between Peru and Bolivia, made in 1873, further complicated the situation. Diplomatic relations between Chile and Bolivia were broken off on February 10, 1879, and hostilities commenced four days later. On April 5, 1879, Chile declared war against Peru.

Secretary of State Evarts refused in 1879 to join with Germany and Great Britain in mediation between Chile and Peru, on the ground that single or collective mediation would at the time carry the impression of dictation or coercion in disparagement of belligerent rights.¹ No objection was made to efforts to restore peace wherever the good offices of the United States might be usefully proffered; but it was intimated that no premature efforts nor any effort in combination with other neutral powers would be made. In the same year Mr. Pettis, American Minister to Bolivia, visited Lima and Santiago in order personally to acquaint each of the three governments with the attitude of the others concerning peace.¹ The Department of State criticised his action as rash and unauthorized. The Chilean press had represented that Mr. Pettis had indicated a purpose on the part of the government of the United States to end the war by intervention or arbitration on terms proposed by itself, but these statements were dismissed by the Department of State as the false utterances of a hostile press.

¹ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 34.

Secretary of State Blaine, on June 15, 1881, instructed Mr. Hurlbut, American Minister to Peru, in the event that the Chilean authorities were willing to allow the establishment of the provisional government set up by Señor Calderon, to encourage the Peruvians to accept any reasonable conditions to make this result possible, and to impress upon the Chileans the desirability of a liberal policy.² The United States believed that Peru should make peace, even if loss of territory were demanded; and the weight of American influence with Chile would be used to make the cession of territory a subject of negotiation, and not a condition precedent to negotiations. The objects of the provisional Peruvian government, thought Mr. Blaine, were to establish a constitutional government and to open negotiations for peace without the imposition of preliminary conditions on either side. Chilean rights as a result of success in war were recognized, and it was admitted that cession of territory by Peru might necessarily follow as a price of peace. Mr. Hurlbut was expressly warned that the time for friendly intervention had not arrived.

The course of Mr. Hurlbut, giving the impression that the United States would interfere actively in the South

¹ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 35.

² Foreign Relations, 1881, p. 914.

American conflict, led Mr. Blaine to reprimand him for acting beyond the scope of his instructions. Especially did Mr. Blaine disavow the statement that the United States would regard with disfavor any annexation by Chile of Peruvian territory by right of conquest.¹ Mr. Hurlbut was expected, complained Mr. Blaine, not so much to protest against possible annexation as to induce in a friendly manner the Chilean authorities to allow the Peruvian authorities to attempt the satisfaction of Chilean rights and interests without enforced annexation as a condition precedent to negotiation. He also disapproved of the impression given as to the American attitude toward the Calderon government; of the suggestion that the Argentine government send a minister to Peru; and of Hurlbut's efforts to secure a naval station from Peru for the United States. It was added that the government of the United States did not understand the suppression of the Calderon government by Chile and the arrest of President Calderon. These circumstances, it was thought, justified the sending of a special mission to deal with the situation. On November 30, 1881, Mr. William Henry Trescot was commissioned as special envoy to Chile, Peru and Bolivia, to deal with the difficulties existing between the three republics.² The Third Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Walker Blaine, was directed to accompany him. All matters relating to the dispute were to be referred to him instead of to the American ministers. The Calderon government had been recognized under the discretionary authority given to Mr. Christiancy, and that government had been authorized to make a treaty of peace without the cession of territory.³ The Chilean authorities forbade the exercise of governmental functions by the Calderon government in territory held by Chile.¹ Later Calderon was arrested and his government extinguished. Mr. Blaine instructed that if this was done in resentment of the continued recognition of the Calderon government by the United States, Chile should be informed that it was regarded as sufficient cause to break off diplomatic relations.² Should Chile persist in destroying Peruvian nationality and absorbing an independent state, the United States would appeal to the other American republics in order to determine what steps would be taken to prevent the consummation of the Chilean designs.³ The objects of the United States were declared to be the prevention of further bloodshed and the recognition by Chile of the respect due to the United States in its attempts at friendly interposition, which sprang from its disinterested purpose, legitimate influence and established position. In case of continued Chilean opposition to the friendly interposition of other powers, Mr. Trescot was instructed strongly to represent to that government "the disappointment and dissatisfaction felt by the United States at such a deplorable policy." There was no intent to interfere with Chile's rights as military conqueror, nor was there any desire to prejudice her plans for future security. However, Mr. Blaine declared:

¹ Foreign Relations, 1881, p. 949.

² Ibid., p. 142.

³ Ibid., pp. 144, 145, 146.

We cannot regard with unconcern the destruction of Peruvian nationality. If our good offices are rejected, and this policy of the absorption of an independent state be persisted in, this government will consider itself discharged from any further obligation to be influenced in its action by the position which Chile has assumed, and will hold itself free to appeal to the other republics of this continent to join it in an effort to avert consequences which cannot be confined to Chile and Peru, but which threaten with extremest danger the political institutions, the peaceful progress, and the liberal civilization of all America.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1881, p. 146.

² Ibid., p. 146.

³ Ibid., 1881, p. 148.

Secretary of State Frelinghuysen reversed the policy of Mr. Blaine and revoked the instructions to Mr. Trescot threatening intervention. The President, Mr. Frelinghuysen said, held that he had no right to dictate terms of peace to independent republics, as a policy of dictation, even to prevent war, would cause taxation for the benefit of foreign nations to maintain an army and navy.¹ Mr. Trescot was informed that the policy expressed in Washington's farewell address would control the conduct of the United States with the South American republics. He was directed not to visit the Atlantic republics of South America after leaving Chile. The President would hereafter reserve to himself the question of entering into consultations to promote peace with certain friendly nationalities without extending it to others, for "if such partial confidence would create jealousy and ill-will, peace, the object sought by such consultation, would not be promoted." Mr. Frelinghuysen also indefinitely postponed a conference of the American nations on international arbitration, for which invitations had, at the instance of Mr. Blaine, been issued.

American representatives in South America were, however, directed to aid the powers at war in a friendly way to agree on a treaty of peace, and the minister to Chile was instructed to make certain suggestions to the Chilean government in relation to terms.² Meanwhile, the terms of peace which Chile had demanded and which the Calderon government had refused, were accepted by the Iglesias government. They were more severe than the terms suggested by the United States; but in spite of this fact, as well as of the fact that they were accepted on the part of Peru by a government other than that which the United States had recognized, the United States would not obstruct the way to peace. The United States made representations, however, in regard to the disposition of the guano deposits, because of the interests of American creditors.¹ On November 15, 1883, Mr. Frelinghuysen, writing to Mr. Phelps, again disclaimed any desire to interfere with Peru's right to settle its affairs in its own way.² With the Peruvian people, the United States maintained relations of friendship and sympathy. With the administration at the time assuming control of the government, the United States had little concern, and American action would be conditioned by the action of the Peruvian assembly in its own choice of governments and its own ratifications of terms of peace.

¹*Foreign Relations*, 1882, p. 57.

²*Foreign Relations*, 1883, p. 709.

A treaty of peace was signed between Chile and Peru on October 20, 1883, and a truce was signed between Chile and Bolivia on April 4 of the following year. Peru ceded to Chile the rich nitrate province of Tarapacá, and agreed to the occupation by Chile of the provinces of Tacna and Arica for a period of ten years, after the expiration of which a plebiscite was to be held, to determine whether Peruvian or Chilean nationality would prevail. The country favored by the plebiscite was to pay to the other ten million dollars in Chilean silver. The plebiscite has not taken place, and the failure to hold it has continued to be a subject of controversy between these countries till the present time. Peru emerged from the war financially crippled, both in public revenues and in private resources. Bolivia lost all her seacoast and became an exclusively interior state. Chile gained primacy among the republics of the west coast of South America. Had the intervention of Mr. Blaine been successful, the failure of which he attributed to President Arthur's refusal to give it his continued support, although previously pledged, the termination of the war would have been radically different. A policy of determined intervention in a conflict between three South American republics was displaced by a policy of careful reserve and abundant caution, even in the clearest cases of friendly representation.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1883, p. 711.

² Ibid., 1883, p. 729.

In discussing the extension of the policy of non-intervention, as originally applied to Europe, to the entire system of American States, I have attempted, by an examination of actual cases, to point out the direction which the development of the policy has taken. In the light of what has thus been disclosed, it appears that the policy has been understood to preclude the United States from intervening in the internal politics of American states, and to preclude European states from intervening in the western hemisphere either to gain territory, or to change the political system or control the destiny of American nations. The practice of a policy is more significant than its enunciation. We have seen that in several instances American States have requested the intervention of the United States in their controversies with other powers, and that the United States has consistently held that its intervention could not be demanded as of right. It also became settled that the United States would forcibly resist territorial aggression, the imposition of foreign political systems, or the extension of political control by non-American governments in the western hemisphere, as illustrated in the case of the French intervention in Mexico and the Venezuela boundary dispute. The right of the United States to intervene to protect the rights and safety of its citizens stands apart from the principle of non-intervention as a general right, to be exercised in Latin-America as well as elsewhere. On certain occasions, when the United States seemed to depart from its policy of non-intervention, its action was later reversed or the act of the intervening official was disavowed. The Chile-Peruvian war and the Egan asylum case were examples. Again and again the United States had refused to take part in joint representations to Latin-American states. The zealous desire to protect American rights has sometimes led to excessive claims, such as that of Admiral Benham regarding contraband in the Brazilian naval revolt. But the mere enunciation of a position does not suffice to establish it. This was so even with President Monroe's famous declaration of 1823; and it must be so with recent proposals, such as that of President Wilson, to extend the Monroe Doctrine to the world. The effect of such proposals must await the test of history. The cases examined abundantly establish the principle of non-intervention as a definite policy.

PART II

DEPARTURES FROM THE PRINCIPLE OF NON-INTERVENTION BY THE UNITED STATES

CHAPTER III

INTERVENTION IN CUBA

THE most striking departure from the American policy of non-intervention in relation to American states and territory was the Cuban intervention. The importance of Cuba to the interests of the United States has been realized from the beginning. The desire to secure the island as a part of the United States, in case it should pass from Spanish control, was shown in the attitude of American statesmen in early times. Jefferson advocated the acquisition of Cuba by peaceful means.¹ The Jefferson Cabinet on October 22, 1808, unanimously agreed that while the United States would be content that the island should continue under Spanish rule, French or British rule would be frowned upon.² In 1822 a rumor prevailed that Great Britain was secretly negotiating with Spain for the cession of the island.³ This Canning denied. War between France and Spain led John Quincy Adams, as Secretary of State, to declare that the ultimate annexation of Cuba was essential to the preservation of the Union, although at the time inopportune.⁴ The United States, he said, was unalterably opposed to French or British encroachments. Mr. Randall was commissioned special agent to Cuba to report on political conditions and to observe the objects and move-

¹ Ford, Jefferson's Writings, vol. x, pp. 159, 257-258, 278.

² Ibid., vol. i, p. 334.

³ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, pp. 379-380.

⁴ 44 Br. and Fr. State Papers, p. 138.

ments of foreign agents there.¹ Henry Clay, as Secretary of State, directed the American ministers to Spain, France and Great Britain to inform the governments of those countries of the unwillingness of the United States to acquiesce in the transfer of Cuba to any other power.² Mexico and Colombia, seeking to aid Cuban independence, planned expeditions for that purpose. Colombia complied with Clay's request to suspend operations until the Congress of Panama could be consulted, but Mexico refused unreserved acceptance of the suggestion.³

Opposition to apprehended European intervention in Cuba was the central theme of our early Cuban relations. In refusing, in 1825, a proposal of Canning that the United States join France and Great Britain in disclaiming any intention to occupy Cuba, Clay gave as a reason that Spain, thinking her colonies safe, might prolong the colonial wars in America, and that American policy was opposed to such action.⁴ The French government rejected a similar proposal from Great Britain. The supposed danger that Spain might cede or lose Cuba to some European power caused Secretary of State Van Buren in 1829 to argue for continued Spanish control. Cuban subjection to a state of South America, he thought, would lead to European control, and the emancipation of slaves in Cuba would prejudice the interests of the slave-holders of the South.⁵ Confidential reports to the Department of State from what was supposed to be a trustworthy source indicated the existence on the part of the British ministry and certain abolition societies of

¹ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 384.

² Ibid., vol. vi, p. 447; Am. State Papers, For. Rel., vol. v, pp. 855-856; II Gallatin's Writings, p. 346.

³ 44 Br. and For. State Papers, p. 44; 26 ibid., p. 1152.

⁴ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 457.

⁵ 26 Br. and For. State Papers, pp. 1149-1151.

a purpose to effect a union between the creoles and negroes of the island, and to set up a negro military republic under British protection.¹ Daniel Webster, who was then Secretary of State, thought that this would be a death-blow to slavery in the United States, and would constitute a serious menace to American commerce. "It is quite obvious," he stated, in a letter to Mr. Campbell, the American consul at Havana, "that any attempt on the part of England to employ a force in Cuba for any purpose would bring on a war, involving possibly all Europe as well as the United States."²

In 1852 the ministers of France and Great Britain, at Washington, invited the United States to join their government in the conclusion of a tripartite convention, the substance of which was contained in the following article:

The high contracting parties hereby, severally and collectively, disclaim, now and for hereafter, all intention to obtain possession of the island of Cuba, and they respectively bind themselves to discountenance all attempts to that effect on the part of any power or individuals whatsoever.

The high contracting parties declare severally and collectively, that they will not obtain or maintain for themselves, any exclusive control over the said island, nor assume nor exercise any dominion over the same.³

This proposal was declined. The response of the United States was made by Edward Everett, as Secretary of State, in identic notes addressed to the British and French ministers at Washington on December 1, 1852. In these notes, which attracted wide attention, the Cuban question was comprehensively reviewed; and the conclusion was reached that the United States, although it entertained no designs on the island, could not be expected and could not properly be asked to agree not to acquire it under any future conditions.¹

¹ 44 Br. and For. State Papers, p. 174.

² 44 ibid., p. 176.

³ S. Ex. Doc. 13, 32 Cong. 2 Sess., p. 15.

Only five years before Mr. Everett's note was written, President Polk had made a serious effort to bring about the annexation of Cuba to the United States. Among the reasons by which he supported his action was the fear that Great Britain would eventually seize the island, and thus have the coastwide trade of the United States at her mercy. He authorized the offer of a maximum of a hundred million dollars for the cession.² The Spanish government would not listen to the proposal, the minister of the United States at Madrid reporting that "sooner than see the island transferred to any power, they would prefer seeing it sink in the ocean."³

In the celebrated "Ostend Manifesto" of 1854, the annexation of Cuba by the United States was openly and strongly advocated. This document was signed by James Buchanan, John Y. Mason and Pierre Soulé, ministers respectively to Great Britain, France and Spain, who had been instructed to meet at some convenient point in Europe to confer and report upon the Cuban question. They strongly recommended the purchase of the island, and, in case Spain should persist in refusing to sell, intimated that the United States would be justified in acting upon the principle of self-preservation, especially if conditions should develop, as regards the slave population, that would endanger the peace and tranquility of the states of the United States in which slavery existed. Should such conditions

¹ S. Ex. Doc. 13, 32 Cong. 2 Sess., pp. 17, 22-23; Moore, Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 460.

² H. Ex. Doc. 121, 32 Cong. 1 Sess., p. 49.

³ Ibid., p. 59.

supervene, and Spain still remain obdurate to offers of purchase, the question would, in the opinion of the signers of the "manifesto," then arise as to whether further action was not imperative; and in this relation they significantly declared:

Should this question be answered in the affirmative, then, by every law, human and divine, we shall be justified in wresting it from Spain if we possess the power; and this upon the very same principle that would justify an individual in tearing down the burning house of his neighbor if there were no other means of preventing the flames from destroying his own home.

The Ostend Manifesto became a political issue, in connection with the contest over slavery; but condemnation of it was not confined to the members of any one political party. There were leading Democrats who repudiated its recommendations. Naturally, the Republican platform of 1856 denounced it, declaring "that the highwayman's plea that might makes right embodied in the Ostend circular . . . would bring shame and dishonor upon any government or people that gave it their sanction."¹ The Democratic Secretary of State, William M. Marcy, in a letter to Soulé, remarked that doubtless "it was not extended by yourself and your colleagues to offer to Spain the alternative of cession or seizure."² Marcy, while expressing the opinion that the acquisition of Cuba would be advantageous as "a precautionary measure of security," stated that he did not regard existing conditions as imperiling the existence of the government. "But," he added, "should the contingency suggested in your report ever arise there is no reason to doubt that the case will be promptly met by the deliberate judgment and decisive action of the American people."³

¹ Stanwood, History of the Presidency, p. 272.

² H. Ex. Doc. 93, 33 Cong. 2 Sess., p. 135.

³ Ibid., p. 136.

During the years 1868-1878, the civil strife, commonly known as the "Ten Years' War," kept the Cuban question before the American people, and gave rise to many perplexing problems. President Grant, in his annual message to Congress, December 6, 1869, said that the United States would refrain from enforcing its views upon unwilling nations and from exercising an interested part without invitation in the quarrels of other states, whether between nation and nation or between government and subjects.¹ The Cuban struggle, he declared, had not reached a state of actual war, nor had the insurgents demonstrated their capacity for recognition as belligerents. Spain had accepted a tender of the good offices of the United States only on terms unfair to Cuba, and the offer was withdrawn. Later, in a special message to Congress, the President reviewed the progress of the disorderly system of warfare prevailing in the island, the chief results of which were devastation and wanton destruction. The law of nations was violated by both parties. No responsible de facto government existed on the island, nor had Spain quelled the revolt or protected the rights and interests of foreign nations and their citizens. Similar complaints, together with discussions of the question of declaring neutrality and according to the insurgents belligerent rights, may be found in the annual message of 1870, as well as in subsequent communications to Congress. Vigorous protests were made to Spain against her conduct in numerous matters.² The termination of the conflict, together with the abolition of slavery and the granting of autonomy to the islands, was urged.³ The president regarded ". . . independence, and emancipation, of course, as the only certain and even necessary, solution of the question of Cuba. And, in his mind, all incidental questions are quite subordinate to those, the larger interests of the United States in this respect.”¹

¹ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. vii, p. 31.

² Ibid., vol. vii, pp. 64, 97, 147.

³ Foreign Relations, 1871, p. 733; 1872, p. 580; 1873, vol. ii, pp. 1032-1033; 1874, p. 859.

September 26, 1872, a circular was issued by Señor Jil Colunje, Colombian secretary of interior and foreign relations, to the American governments relative to the situation in Cuba. The length of the contest, the hopelessness of peace, the devastation and ruin of the island and the utter disregard for law and order rendered the situation so serious that the American nations, so the circular declared, could not longer remain unconcerned.² Cuban rights should be respected. Cuba as an independent nation would mean the disappearance of slavery. Colombia also proposed that the governments of Spanish America and the United States act jointly to obtain from Spain the recognition of Cuban independence. In case the expenses of the war caused Spain to hesitate, the mediating governments might agree to a pro rata reimbursement, requiring none in return, although the resources of Cuba were ample. In case mediation was accepted, it was proposed that confiscation of property and capital punishment for political offenses be discontinued. In replying to this circular, Mr. Fish, speaking as Secretary of State, intimated that the United States would not enter upon the course suggested by Colombia, unless the answers of the Spanish American states to the circular and the conditions prevailing in Cuba furnished reasonable grounds to believe that American intervention would be successful.³ On another occasion Mr. Fish also intimated that, instead of taking it for granted that the United States would act upon the proposals contained in the circular, it would have been advisable to consult the government beforehand as to whether it was willing to assume the rôle of arbiter.¹

¹ Foreign Relations, 1874, p. 862.

² Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 70.

³ Ibid., vol. vi, pp. 70-71.

On November 5, 1875, Mr. Fish sent to Caleb Cushing, then American minister at Madrid, a paper, known as instruction No. 266, referring to the confiscation of estates belonging to American citizens, the trial of Americans in contravention of treaty obligations, the case of the Virginius, and finally, the general relations of the United States and Spain as affected by the situation in Cuba.² The hope that an adjustment would be reached, based upon emancipation and self-government, had, he said, been unrealized, and all efforts by Spain forcibly to end the strife had failed. All suggestions of reform and offers of mediation made by the United States had been rejected. Reconciliation was agreed to only on terms making reconciliation impossible.³ The Spanish government had insisted that no state of war existed entitling the insurgents to belligerent rights, but demanded all the privileges of war for itself. During seven years of tremendous strain on the part of the United States to fulfill the most exacting demands any government could make under any doctrine or claim of international obligation upon another, Spain had failed to justify any hopes for pacification. Mr. Fish declared that the United States was therefore entitled to be relieved of the strain, which could only be done by the termination of the struggle. Any further reticence, it was observed, would be inconsistent with the interests of both governments; and in case the war was not terminated, Mr. Fish stated that the time was at hand for "other governments to intervene, solely with the view of bringing to an end a disastrous and destructive conflict and of restoring peace in the island of Cuba.”¹

¹ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 70.

² H. Ex. Doc. 90, 44 Cong. 1 Sess., p. 7.

³ Ibid., p. 8.

In its purpose to bring the war to a close, the United States desired to obtain the moral support of the European powers. Instruction No. 266 was sent to General Schenck to be read to Lord Derby in order to gain the influence of Great Britain in the settlement of the Cuban question.² It was likewise sent to the American ministers at Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Vienna and Rome, with directions to impart the substance of it to the ministers of foreign affairs, and to suggest that Spain be urged either to terminate or to abandon the contest.³ General Schenck was authorized to explain to Lord Derby that intervention was not contemplated as an immediate result, but only as a contingent necessity in case the contest was prolonged and existing claims were not adjusted.⁴ In his annual message to Congress, December 7, 1875, President Grant reviewed the existing situation in Cuba, saying that “other nations will be compelled to assume the responsibility which devolves upon them, and to seriously consider the only remaining measures possible, mediation and intervention.”⁵ The President, while mentioning these as the only alternatives for ending the strife, did not recommend any measure of intervention, holding himself ready to do all he could to reach a peaceful solution.⁶ The United States had already had many opportunities for interference, if such had

¹ H. Ex. Doc. 90, 44 Cong. 1 Sess., p. 11.

² S. Report No. 885, 55 Cong. 2 Sess., pp. 152-153; S. Doc. 213, 54 Cong. 1 Sess.

³ H. Ex. Doc. 90, 44 Cong. 1 Sess., pp. 13-14; S. Report No. 885, 55 Cong., 2 Sess., pp. 130, 140-141, 148, 152-153, 154, 171, 174.

⁴ H. Ex. Doc. 90, 44 Cong. 1 Sess., p. 13.

⁵ Foreign Relations, 1875, vol. i, pp. x-xi.

⁶ Ibid., 1875, vol. i, p. xi.

been its purpose. But proposals from the government of Spain and the immediate reform of the internal administration of the island checked any plans for intervention until the practical result of the proposals and measures could be ascertained.

The French government, while professing to be desirous of aiding in the matter, intimated that it would have to wait, because of the internal conditions of Spain; but expressed a willingness to cooperate with the United States in terminating the war when the time should seem to be favorable.¹ The German government was disposed to act only in concert with the other powers, but later manifested a disinclination to do anything on account of assurances received from Spain.² Great Britain refused to be involved if Spain stood off and declined interference.³ Lord Derby doubted if Spain would give up the island under any circumstances except by force. Portugal would not make any representation to the Spanish government.⁴ Russia agreed to advise Spain regarding the termination of the contest, but in fact referred more directly to the desire to avert a conflict between the United States and Spain.⁵ Italy agreed to the American proposal.⁶

The foregoing correspondence practically brings to a close the efforts during the administrations of President Grant to effect a settlement of the Cuban question. On more than one occasion, and especially in the case of the Virginian, a rupture had seemed to be imminent. The resources of diplomacy were severely taxed; and it was

¹ S. Report No. 885, 55 Cong. 2 Sess., pp. 143-147.

² Ibid., p. 151; Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. vi, p. 101.

³ S. Report No. 885, 55 Cong. 2 Sess., p. 163.

⁴ Ibid., pp. 154, 171-172.

⁵ Ibid., pp. 173, 176-179.

⁶ Ibid., p. 169.

only by the pursuit of a consistent policy, directed to the maintenance of peace, that intervention was avoided. During the year 1876, public interest in the United States came to be more and more absorbed in domestic problems. The celebration of the centenary of American independence, the presidential campaign, and disturbed political conditions in some of the southern states, followed by the contest over the results of the presidential election, all united to cause a withdrawal of public attention from foreign affairs. Moreover, the continued operation of the Mixed Commission under the agreement of February 12, 1871, by which the settlement of claims growing out of the Cuban insurrection was gradually effected, exerted a tranquilizing influence on relations with Spain. The insurrection continued to drag on, but less notice was taken of it than before. President Hayes, in his first annual message of December 3, 1877, adverted to the strife in Cuba as being still in progress, but he adhered to the policy of non-intervention.¹ In the following year the struggle was formally brought to an end by the so-called peace of Zanjón.

The insurrection that broke out in Cuba in February, 1895 spread rapidly, and was characterized by active fighting. The revolt quickly assumed formidable proportions. The Spanish authorities, in spite of their command of considerable military forces, offered little effective resistance to the insurgents. Mr. Olney, in his communication to Spain, did not suggest intervention, but sought to impress upon the government the importance of ameliorating conditions in the island and bringing to an end the destruction and devastation that were in progress.² Spain, on the other hand, sought to minimize the causes of complaint, and to emphasize alleged violations of neutrality in the United States. In a comprehensive report to the President, Mr. Olney reviewed the relative positions of the contending parties, commenting upon the inability of Spain either to make her rule effective or to afford redress for injuries, as well as upon the gradual impoverishment of the island.¹ President Cleveland, in his message to Congress of December 7, 1896, adopted a conciliatory attitude.² He discussed the different solutions suggested, and advised against intervention on the ground that the United States had a character to maintain, with right and not might as its rule of conduct. Conscious, however, of the dangers that lurked in the futile continuance of the struggle, he sounded a note of warning, saying:

¹ Foreign Relations, 1877, p. xii.

² Foreign Relations, 1897, p. 542.

When the inability of Spain to deal successfully with the insurrection has become manifest, and it is demonstrated that her sovereignty is extinct in Cuba for all purposes of its rightful existence, and when a hopeless struggle for its reestablishment has degenerated into a strife which means nothing more than the useless sacrifice of human life and the utter destruction of the very subject-matter of the conflict, a situation will be presented in which our obligations to the sovereignty of Spain will be superseded by higher obligations, which we can hardly hesitate to recognize and discharge.

The change of administration in the United States in 1897 was not attended with any radical change of attitude on the part of the Government towards the Cuban question, but there was a growing popular feeling against the enforcement of the policy of reconcentration instituted by General Weyler. This sentiment was reflected in a protest addressed by Mr. Sherman, the new Secretary of State, to the Spanish minister at Washington, on June 28, 1897, in which it was declared that the President conceived that he had a right to demand that a war, conducted almost within sight of the United States and grievously affecting the interests of its citizens, should "at least be conducted according to the military codes of civilization." The Spanish government, in its reply, maintained that great progress had been made in subduing the insurrection, and, while denying the right of the United States to interfere in the matter, again complained of the support and encouragement which the insurgents received from American sources.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1896, pp. xxxi-xxxvii.

² Ibid., 1896, pp. xxxi-xxxv.

President McKinley, in his annual message of December 6, 1897, reviewed the Cuban problem at much length. His attitude towards Spain was altogether friendly, but he stated that the existing conditions were such as to cause the gravest apprehension. The offer of the friendly offices of the United States, made by his predecessor in April 1896, had, he said, altogether failed, the answer of Spain in substance being that the pacification of the island must begin with the submission of the rebels to the mother country. He described the "cruel policy of concentration" initiated in 1896 as a measure of "extermination," and adverted to the demand which he had made after his inauguration as President for the release or speedy trial of all American citizens who were under arrest in Cuba. This demand had resulted in the release of upwards of twenty prisoners who were citizens of the United States. The new Minister to Spain, General Woodford, had, said President McKinley, been instructed to assure Spain of the sincere wish of the United States to lend its aid toward the ending of the struggle by a solution which should be just and honorable alike to Spain and to the Cuban people. Between the departure of General Woodford from the United States and his arrival in Spain, Señor Canovas, the head of the Spanish cabinet, had fallen by the hands of an assassin and a new administration had been installed under the leadership of Señor Sagasta. It had fallen to the latter to answer General Woodford's representations, and the answer was, said President McKinley, in the direction of a better understanding. Señor Sagasta had stated that Spain had decided to put into effect the political reforms which he had previously advocated for the purpose of giving Cuba autonomy while guarding Spanish sovereignty. After thus rehearsing the negotiations, President McKinley stated that of the untried measures there remained only "recognition of the insurgents as belligerents; recognition of the independence of Cuba; neutral intervention to end the war by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, and intervention in favor of one or the other party. I speak not," declared President McKinley, "of forcible annexation, for that cannot be thought of. That, by our code of morality, would be criminal aggression." President McKinley then discussed the question of the recognition of belligerency and reached the conclusion that it was unwise and inadmissible. He also opposed intervention, especially in view of the hopeful change that had apparently taken place in the conduct of the Spanish government. Decrees looking to the application of the foreshadowed reforms had, he said, already been promulgated, although their full text had not been received. Moreover, under the appropriation made by Congress on April 4, 1897, effective relief had been given to distressed American citizens in Cuba and the new Spanish government had reversed the military policy which had so greatly shocked the sentiment of humanity, having recalled the commander under whose orders it was initiated, and had set on foot measures to relieve the horrors of starvation. No American citizen, so far as the government knew, was then in arrest or confinement in Cuba. The near future would, said President McKinley, demonstrate whether the indispensable condition of a righteous peace was likely to be attained; and if it should later appear to be the duty of the United States to intervene by force, it should be "without fault on our part, and only because the necessity of such action will be so clear as to command the support and approval of the civilized world."

The pursuit of the peaceful policy which President McKinley had sought to preserve was soon interrupted by certain extraordinary incidents which produced a crisis, and at last brought the United States to the point of forcible intervention. The first of these was the surreptitious publication of a letter which the Spanish minister at Washington had addressed to a personal correspondent in Havana. This letter, besides describing the negotiations then pending between the United States and Spain for a commercial arrangement in regard to Cuba, as a mere diplomatic expedient intended to gain time, contained an analysis of the political situation in the United States, in which opprobrious epithets were applied to the President, who was represented as being a shifty politician, anxious to keep on good terms with those who advocated as well as with those who opposed intervention in Cuba. The fact that this letter was private detracted nothing from the painful effects produced by its publication. Its author manifested his appreciation of the circumstances by cabling his resignation to Madrid before a demand for his recall could be presented. The excitement caused by this incident had by no means died away when, on February 15, 1898, the sinking of the U. S. S. Maine, as the result of an explosion, occurred in the harbor of Havana, with the loss of two of her officers and two hundred and sixty-four of the crew. The sinking of the ship was separately investigated by American and Spanish naval commissions, which rendered opposite reports as to the cause of the explosion. While public feeling in the United States was deeply stirred by this incident, the impression that Spain was unable to restore order in Cuba was greatly strengthened by a notable speech made in the Senate by Senator Proctor of Vermont, who had lately visited the island. Hence, while negotiations to reach a peaceful solution were not wholly abandoned, there was little reason on either side to believe or to hope that they would prove to be successful.

General Woodford, at Madrid, continued earnestly to labor for a practicable basis of settlement. The Spanish Government offered to submit the affairs of the Maine to arbitration, to revoke all orders of concentration and accept assistance from the United States in feeding and extending succor to persons in need, and to confide the preparations for the pacification of the island to an insular parliament. But, as this parliament was not to meet until the 4th of May, the Spanish government intimated that it would not find it inconvenient to accept at once a suspension of hostilities if the insurgents should request it from the Spanish commander-in-chief, with whom it would rest to determine the duration and conditions of the suspension. On this basis the Spanish government sought to secure delay in the transmission by the President to Congress of a message which he had prepared on the Cuban situation. Great impatience had already been manifested in Congress and elsewhere at the delays that had taken place in the submission of the President's message. It was at length sent in on April 11, 1898.

In this message, President McKinley, after reviewing historically the relations of the United States with Spain in regard to Cuba, discussed the various expedients which had been suggested as a means of solving the problem with which he was confronted. Discussing, first, the question of recognizing the independence of the insurgent government in Cuba, he invoked as a precedent the message of President Jackson to Congress of December 21, 1836, on the question of recognizing the independence of Texas, and reached the conclusion that the recognition of the independence of the so-called Cuban Republic would be unjustified on grounds of law and would also be inexpedient. There remained for consideration, said President McKinley, the alternative forms of intervention to end the war, either by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, or by becoming the active ally of the one party or the other. The latter alternative he rejected. Of the former, he stated that the grounds for such intervention might be summarized as follows:

First: In the cause of humanity and to put an end to the barbarities, bloodshed, starvation, and horrible miseries now existing there, and which the parties to the conflict are either unable or unwilling to stop or mitigate. It is no answer to say this is all in another country, belonging to another nation, and is therefore none of our business. It is specially our duty, for it is right at our door.

Second: We owe it to our citizens in Cuba to afford them that protection and indemnity for life and property which no government there can or will afford, and to that end to terminate the conditions that deprive them of legal protection.

Third: The right to intervene may be justified by the very serious injury to the commerce, trade, and business of our people, and by the wanton destruction of property and devastation of the island.

Fourth, and which is of the utmost importance: The present condition of affairs in Cuba is a constant menace to our peace, and entails upon this government an enormous expense. With such a conflict waged for years in an island so near us and with which our people have such trade and business relations; when the lives and liberty of our citizens are in constant danger and their property destroyed and themselves ruined; where our trading vessels are liable to seizure and are seized at our very door by war ships of a foreign nation, the expeditions of filibustering that we are powerless to prevent altogether, and the irritating questions and entanglements thus arising—all these and others that I need not mention, with the resulting strained relations, are a constant menace to our peace, and compel us to keep on a semi-war footing with a nation with which we are at peace.

On a view of all the facts and considerations, President McKinley requested from Congress authority to take measures to bring about the final termination of hostilities between the government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the island the establishment of a stable government, with power to make such use of the military and naval forces of the United States as might be necessary for those purposes. He declared that, having exhausted every effort to relieve the intolerable condition of affairs that had so long existed, he was prepared to execute every obligation imposed upon him by the constitution and the law. In conclusion, however, he stated that since his message was prepared, he had received official information that the latest decree of the Queen Regent of Spain directed General Blanco, in order to facilitate peace, to proclaim a suspension of hostilities, the duration and details of which had not yet been communicated to the United States. President McKinley commended this communication to the consideration of Congress in the solemn deliberations on which it was about to enter.

On April 19, 1898, Congress passed the following joint resolution for intervention:

WHEREAS the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the Island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battleship, with two hundred and sixty-five of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Havana, and cannot longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April eleventh, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the Island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the Island of Cuba, and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several states, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said Island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the Island to its people.¹

This resolution, with the approval of the President, became a law on April 20. On the same day, Mr. Sherman, as Secretary of State, telegraphed the text of the resolution to General Woodford, at Madrid, with instructions to present it to the Spanish government and formally to demand that Spain at once relinquish her authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw her land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.¹ Any desire on the part of the United States to exercise jurisdiction, control or sovereignty over the island was disclaimed. Unless a satisfactory response to these demands should be received by Saturday noon, April 23, it was stated that the President would without further notice execute the provisions of the joint resolution in order to end the conflict in Cuba. Señor Polo de Bernabe, who had succeeded Señor Dupuy de Lome as Spanish Minister at Washington, asked for his passports on April 20. On April 21, the Spanish minister of state in a note to General Woodford, declared that the joint resolution, since it denied the legitimate interests of Spain in Cuba and threatened armed intervention, was equivalent to an evident declaration of war, and that consequently diplomatic relations between the countries were broken. On April 22, President McKinley proclaimed a blockade of the north coast of Cuba, including ports between Cardenas and Bahia Honda, and of the port of Cienfuegos on the south coast; and on April 23rd he called for volunteers to execute the purpose of the joint resolution. In a special message to Congress on April 25th, he recommended a formal declaration of the existence of a state of war between the United States and Spain. This recommendation was immediately accepted and on the same day an act was passed by Congress and was approved by the President, declaring the existence of the state of war from and including April 21.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1898, p. 763.

It is beyond my purpose to follow the military events of the Spanish-American war; nor is it pertinent here to discuss the terms of the treaty of peace, the eventual grant of independence to the island, or the interventions that have since taken place under the treaties between the United States and Cuba. President McKinley, in his annual message of December 5, 1898, declared that, after the pacification of the island, aid and protection should be given to the Cubans in forming a government of their own, and that military occupation by the United States would continue only until complete tranquility and a stable government had been established. The independence of Cuba was established and its political relations to the United States were determined by the treaty of March 22, 1903, which embodied the so-called Platt amendment to the act of Congress of March 21, 1901, making appropriations for the support of the United States Army. This amendment was, by its terms, declared to be intended to fulfill the purpose declared in the joint resolution of April 20, 1898, to leave the government and control of Cuba to its people, after the expulsion of the Spanish authorities. To this end the President was authorized to leave the government and control of the island to its people so soon as a government should have been established under a constitution which should define the future relations of the United States with Cuba, in conformity with the conditions which the amendment prescribed. These conditions were, in substance, (1) that the Cuban government should never enter into any engagement with any foreign power which would impair or tend to impair the independence of the island, nor permit any such power to obtain a lodgment in or control over any part of the island; (2) that the Cuban government should not assume or contract any public debt for which the ordinary revenues of the island, after defraying current expenses, were inadequate; (3) that the United States might intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for the discharge of the obligations which the United States had assumed on the part of Cuba under the treaty of peace with Spain; (4) that all acts of the United States in Cuba during its military occupancy should be treated as valid, and that all lawful rights acquired thereunder should be maintained and protected; (5) that the government of Cuba should execute plans for the sanitation of the cities of the island in order to prevent the recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases, and to assure protection to the people and commerce of Cuba as well as to the commerce of the southern ports of the United States and their inhabitants; (6) that the Isle of Pines should be omitted from the proposed constitutional boundaries of Cuba, the title to the island to be left to future adjustment by treaty; (7) that, in order to enable the United States to maintain the independence of Cuba, and protect its people as well as to provide for its own defense, the government of Cuba should sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States; (8) that by way of further assurance, the government of Cuba should embody the foregoing conditions in a permanent treaty with the United States.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1898, pp. 762-763.

These conditions were incorporated into an ordinance appended to the Cuban constitution. They were also embodied in a permanent treaty between the United States and Cuba, signed at Havana on May 22, 1903, the ratifications of which were exchanged at Washington on July 1, 1904. By a treaty concluded July 2, 1903, Cuba leased to the United States certain areas of land and water at Guantanamo and Bahia Honda for naval or coaling stations.

President Roosevelt, in his annual message to Congress of December 3, 1901, announced that before the session of Congress closed, the putting of the independent government of Cuba on a firm footing would be an accomplished fact. The first president of the Republic of Cuba was inaugurated on May 20, 1902. Thus, in the most striking instance of intervention to be found in its history, the United States, fulfilling the pledge which it had given to the world, kept faith with the object of its solicitude by relinquishing to the people of Cuba the government and control of the island, subject only to such conditions as were essential to the maintenance of its independence and the exercise of orderly self-rule.

CHAPTER IV

INTERVENTION IN THE REVOLUTION AT PANAMA, 1903

WITH the express exception of the case of Cuba, the outstanding instance of American intervention is that of the United States in the revolution at Panama in 1903, resulting in the establishment of the republic of Panama. This intervention, and the controversy with Colombia which followed, has a distinct relation to the treaty of 1846 between the United States and the republic of New Granada, article 35 of which provides that "the United States guarantee, positively and efficaciously, to New Granada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned Isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists; and, in consequence, the United States also guarantee, in the same manner, the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said territory."¹ President Polk, in a message to the Senate, February 10, 1847, transmitting the treaty of 1846 to that body, observed that the conditions inducing him to lay the document before the Senate were: (1) that the treaty did not propose to guarantee a territory to a foreign nation in which the United States should have no common interest with that nation; (2) that the guarantee was confined to the single province of the Isthmus of Panama, and did not extend to the New Granadan territories generally; (3) that it would constitute no alliance for any political object, but for a purely commercial one, which would command the interest of all maritime nations; and (4) that in entering into the mutual guarantees proposed in Article 35 of the treaty, neither of the parties had entertained any narrow or exclusive views, but were moved "to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus."¹ Moreover, he contended that such a guarantee was necessary to secure for the world this passage, independent of wars and revolutions which might arise among different nations, and was indispensable to effect its construction, either by sovereign states or by private enterprise.

¹ Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, etc., vol. i, p. 312.

The treaty of 1846, therefore, embraces a guarantee of the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, with a view to maintaining a free and open transit, and a guarantee of New Granadan rights of sovereignty and property over the territory. The guarantee of neutrality and sovereignty has in several instances been defined and interpreted by the United States under circumstances which seemed to justify it. We have taken the position that the United States could tender to New Granada, unsought,² such advice as was necessary, in her relation with other powers, to protect the Isthmus under the treaty. The Peruvian government inquired as to the measures which the United States might take in case the neutrality of the Isthmus should be threatened, and suggested that New Granada might make the Isthmus a seat of hostile preparations against Peru, and thus make of the guarantee of neutrality in effect a defensive alliance between New Granada and the United States.³ Mr. Everett, as Secretary of State, replied that the action taken would be controlled by the magnitude of

¹ Richardson, Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. iv, pp. 512-513.

² Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. iii, p. 24.

³ Ibid., vol. iii, p. 25.

American interests, and in the event of a conflict between Peru and New Granada, the good offices of the United States would be offered to prevent it.

It was the opinion of Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, that the United States was under no duty to explain to Colombia the means which it might take to effect the guarantee of Colombian sovereignty.¹ The action of both governments, he observed, should be regulated by the treaty and the law of nations, should the emergency arise. Mr. Fish, as Secretary of State, declared that "a principal object" of New Granada in signing the treaty of 1846 was to maintain her sovereignty over the Isthmus against any attack from abroad.² Secretary of State Evarts expressed the view that the American guarantee of neutrality did not extend to the duty of restraining the transportation of munitions of war to belligerents in a war during which the United States was neutral.³ He directed Mr. Dichman, American minister to Colombia, that the neutrality of the Isthmus, as guaranteed by the United States, should in no sense be confused with the rules which Colombia should be called upon to enforce within her territorial jurisdiction as a sovereign state, as towards all belligerent states. The construction of the American guarantee was reserved for a situation which might require it.

In a convention between the republics of Colombia and Costa Rica, it was agreed to refer certain boundary differences which affected the territorial limits of the State of Panama to the King of the Belgians, and in case of his declination, successively to the King of Spain and the President of the Argentine Republic.⁴ Mr. Blaine, Secre-

¹ Richardson, op. cit., vol. iii, pp. 26-27.

² Foreign Relations, 1871, pp. 247, 248.

³ Moore, J. B., Digest of International Law, vol. iii, p. 27.

⁴ Ibid., vol. iii, pp. 29-32.

tary of State, declared that the United States would not be bound by any arbitration where its rights or interests were concerned, and where it had not been consulted as to the subject or method of the arbitration, or as to the choice of the arbitrator. This position was substantially reaffirmed by Secretaries of State Frelinghuysen and Bayard. By a supplementary convention between Colombia and Costa Rica, concluded January 20, 1886, it was stipulated that the judgment of the arbitration should be confined to territorial limits as set forth in the supplementary convention, and it was further provided that the judgment should not affect the rights which any third party, not having participated in the convention, might claim to the "ownership" of the territory in question. This formal assurance was accepted by the United States, with the understanding that the term "ownership" was used in no restrictive sense, but included all possessory or usufructuary rights, easements, or privileges which the United States or its citizens may possess in the territory under dispute, both as regards the relation of the United States to the contracting parties, and its relation and that of its citizens to any third government not a party to the arbitration.

The guarantee of a free and open transit, in its relation to domestic disturbances which have taken place on the Isthmus, is equal in importance to the guarantee of neutrality and sovereignty. The Isthmus became in due course an important highway of commerce and transportation. In the celebrated Panama riot of 1856, resulting in the loss of life and the destruction of property, the government of New Granada, by a convention concluded at Washington, September 10, 1857, agreed to adjust all claims of American citizens against that government presented before a certain date, and especially such claims as were caused by the riot of 1856.¹ By this convention, New Granada recognized her "obligation to preserve peace and good order along the transit route." The Department of State, in 1866, with respect to a rumor that the state of Panama would attempt to secure her independence, announced that the United States had made a uniform practice of abstention from any connection with questions of internal revolution in the state of Panama or any other Colombian state, and would continue to be neutral in such domestic disturbances.¹ However, in the event of interference with the transit trade due to foreign or domestic invasions in the state of Panama, measures of protection would be taken. Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, significantly observed that the United States had, under the treaty of 1846, undertaken to protect the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama.² In addition, he said: "This engagement, however, has never been acknowledged to embrace the duty of protecting the road across it from the violence of local factions; but it is regarded as the undoubted duty of the Colombian government to protect it against attacks from local insurgents." During the insurrection of 1884-1885, and at other times, the United States had employed its armed forces to protect American citizens and their property along the transit route. In most instances, these steps were taken with the assent of the Colombian government. In regard to these measures, Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, declared that the United States had always recognized the sovereignty of Colombia and had never acknowledged, but had expressly disclaimed, the duty of protecting the line of transit against domestic disturbance. Due to interference with the line of railway by the Liberals, American forces were landed at Panama, November 4, 1901. A degree of American intervention continued during the period of revolution, which was brought to a close when peace was concluded on November 21, 1902, between the Colombian government and the revolutionary forces in the cabin of Rear-Admiral Casey's flagship.

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. iii, pp. 34-35.

¹ Moore, op. cit., vol. iii, p. 38.

² Ibid., vol. iii, p. 38.

The incident which led to our intervention to establish the republic of Panama was the revolution of 1903. On November 3, 1903, the commanders of the Boston, Nashville and Dixie were instructed as follows:

Maintain a free and uninterrupted transit. If interruption threatened by armed force, occupy the line of railroad. Prevent landing of any armed force with hostile intent, either government or insurgent, at any point within 50 miles of Panama. Government force reported approaching Isthmus in vessels. Prevent their landing if, in your judgment, the landing would precipitate a conflict.¹

The revolution followed the next day, and the independence of the republic was declared a day later. Mr. Hay, Secretary of State, instructed the representative of the United States at Panama to enter into relations with the new government when he was satisfied that "a de facto government, republican in form, and without substantial opposition from its own people" had been established.² He was also directed to look to that government for the protection of American citizens and their property, and for the interests of the United States as regards Isthmian transit. On November 13, Mr. Bunau-Varilla was received by President Roosevelt as minister of Panama to the United States.³

The Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty was concluded between the United States and Panama on November 18, 1903. Under its provisions, the United States agreed to guarantee and maintain the independence of the republic of Panama.⁴

¹ Foreign Relations, 1903, p. 267.

² Ibid., 1903, p. 233.

³ Ibid., 1903, pp. 245, 246.

⁴ Malloy, Treaties, Conventions, etc., vol. ii, pp. 1349, et seq.

On her part, Panama relinquished to the United States the control of sanitation and the maintenance of public order within the cities of Colon and Panama. The United States was given the right to employ measures to protect the canal, and no alterations in government, laws or treaties affecting the rights of the United States could be made without her consent. Panama granted to the United States in perpetuity a zone ten miles wide for purposes of a canal, American control of which was to be virtually sovereign. President Roosevelt discussed the provisions of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty in his annual message of December 7, 1903.¹ He cited declarations of policy of earlier statesmen in regard to the canal question, gave a list of revolutions and other outbreaks which had occurred on the Isthmus since the treaty of 1846, and pointed out that American interests under the treaty would be best served by entering into relations with the republic of Panama. He also condemned Colombia for her "contemptuous refusal" to ratify the Hay-Herran treaty, which the Colombian Congress declined to approve on the ground that it infringed national sovereignty and was not in accord with the national constitution and laws.

Colombia immediately protested, invoking article 35 of the treaty of 1846, and the two governments entered upon a controversy which is still unsettled. The question was whether the conduct of the United States in extending recognition at so early a stage of the revolution constituted an act of intervention. General Reyes was sent on a special mission to the United States to present the Colombian case. A capital complaint which he made was that the United States had intervened in a conflict between Colombia and a rebellious province, and had aided in the dismemberment of a portion of Colombia's territory. He denied that the principle of secession was recognized by the internal law of Colombia, and described what he regarded as the proper conditions of recognition in the following terms:

¹*Foreign Relations*, 1903, p. xxxii.

If the people of Panama, animated by the noble sentiments which induced men of action to seek quicker and more rapid progress, had proclaimed their independence and, without foreign aid, been victorious in battle waged against the armies of the mother country, had organized a government, drawn up laws, and proved to the world that it could govern itself by itself and be responsible to other nations for its conduct, without doubt it would have become entitled to recognition by all the powers.¹

He held, however, that none of these things had occurred, and observed that the conduct of the United States was difficult to comprehend in the light of prior American practice. His three main points of complaint included the aid rendered by the United States to the Panama insurrection, the premature recognition of the republic of Panama, and the alleged violation of the terms of the treaty of 1846 between the United States and New Granada. Mr. Hay, as Secretary of State, replied that eighteen governments had recognized the revolution as an "avowed object . . . to secure the construction of the interoceanic canal."² It was inspired, he said, by the desire of the people to safeguard their own interests and at the same time to secure the canal to its providential uses. Any recognition was due to the conviction that interests of utmost importance to the civilized world would be endangered. As to the American guarantee of the neutrality of the Isthmus, and of the sovereignty and property of Colombia over it, such a step had been taken in the interests of an interoceanic communication and of an uninterrupted transit from sea to sea. Responsibility was laid upon Colombia, and a vigorous exchange of notes followed.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1903, p. 292.

² Ibid., 1903, pp. 302-303.

In a special message to Congress, January 4, 1904, President Roosevelt set forth, in clear and explicit terms, definite reasons for the policy of his administration in dealing with the situation in Panama.¹ At the outset, he quoted the position enunciated by Secretary of State Cass in 1858, which was in effect that sovereignty has its duties as well as rights, and that the administration of the states in Central America should not be allowed to close the doors of intercourse to the world. Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, he said, the United States, in engaging to control and police the canal, and to keep it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms, "assumed the position of guarantor of the canal and of its peaceful use by all the world." At the time of the submission to Colombia of the Hay-Herran treaty, three things, Mr. Roosevelt observed, were settled. One was that the canal should be built, and that the time of allowing impediments to delay its construction was past. A second was that the United States would deal in a fair and generous way with the people through whose land the canal might be built. The Hay-Herran treaty, it was declared, fulfilled these conditions, in that it acknowledged, confirmed and preserved Colombian sovereignty over the strip. No nation could undertake to build a canal with a less degree of control than was provided for in the Hay-Herran treaty, and a refusal to grant it was a refusal to enter into any practicable treaty, with the result that Colombia would hold up the world's traffic across the Isthmus. Finally, Congress had settled that the canal was to be built.

¹ Foreign Relations, 1903, pp. 260-278.

With the refusal of the Colombian legislature to ratify the treaty, three possibilities, said President Roosevelt, were open to the United States. One possibility, that Colombia might eventually see the unwisdom of her course, failed, in spite of warnings from the United States as to the consequences which would ensue. A second was the utilization of the Nicaragua route. A third was that the people of the Isthmus might, in their desire to see the canal built, declare their independence, and make its construction possible. This course was taken.

President Roosevelt defended the conduct of the United States in the following terms: "We, in effect, policed the Isthmus in the interests of its inhabitants and of our own national needs, and for the good of the entire civilized world." He then gave the following defense of the act of recognition:

Their recognition by this government was based upon a state of facts in no way dependent for its justifications upon our action in ordinary cases. I have not denied, nor do I wish to deny, either the validity or the propriety of the general rule that a new state should not be recognized as independent till it has shown its ability to maintain its independence. This rule is derived from the principle of non-intervention, and as a corollary of that principle has generally been observed by the United States. But, like the principle from which it is deduced, the rule is subject to exceptions; and there are in my opinion clear and imperative reasons why a departure from it was justified and even required in the present instance.

The reasons for departure in this instance, observed President Roosevelt, embraced our treaty rights, our national interests and safety, and the interests of collective civilization. As to treaty rights, he held that the American guarantee of New Granadan sovereignty over the Isthmus was not a guarantee against domestic insurrection; and where the intervention had taken place under article 35 of the treaty of 1846, it was only with the larger end in view of free Isthmian transit. Colombia, he claimed, did not reciprocate with the grant of reasonable concessions which the United States had a right to expect. National interests and safety, he thought, would be endangered by further delay in constructing the long-contemplated inter-oceanic canal. The third justification for the rapid recognition of Panama was found in the mandate which the United States had received from civilization to build the canal.

A striking analogy was made by President Roosevelt between American action in Panama, and the intervention in Cuba. The Cuban case was even more extreme, he said, as "we intervened even by force on general grounds of national interests and duty." He referred to prophecies made at the time of the Cuban intervention, that the United States would retain Cuba permanently and subordinate it to American interests, but he pointed out that the action of the United States had been otherwise. "The people of Cuba," he said, "have been immeasurably benefited by our interference in their behalf, and our own gain has been great. So will it be in Panama. The people of the Isthmus, and as I firmly believe of the adjacent parts of Central and South America, will be greatly benefited by the building of the canal and the guarantee of peace and order along its line; and hand in hand with the benefit to them will go the benefit to us and to mankind."

Our early recognition of the republic of Panama was clearly an act of intervention, and a distinct departure, as indicated by President Roosevelt, from the principles of non-intervention and the de facto recognition of states. As such, its justification must rest upon the merits of the case, which are clearly set forth, including the reasons therefor, in the President's message of January 4, 1904. He openly avowed the recognition of Panama as an extraordinary procedure, justified by sufficient reasons to require a departure from the rule requiring a demonstration of governmental competency before according recognition. While the principle of non-intervention and the de facto principle of recognition were recognized as general rules of American policy which had ordinarily been observed, yet he regarded both as subject to exceptions, and the Panama situation as one constituting such an exception. In the second capital instance of departure from ordinary American policy, as in the case of the Cuban intervention, we have been satisfied with such a degree of interference as will protect our interests, and preserve to the world, unimpaired, the use of the waterway which we, as the "mandatory of civilization," have constructed. It appears, therefore, that the United States would not be satisfied with any less degree of control over any zone and country where our interests are so great.

Studies in History, Economics and Public Law

edited by

Faculty of Political Science of Columbia University

VOLUME I, 1891-92. 2nd Ed., 1897. 396 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50.

1. The Divorce Problem. A Study in Statistics.
By WALTER F. WILLCOX, Ph.D. Price, 75 cents.
2. The History of Tariff Administration in the United States, from Colonial Times to the McKinley Administrative Bill.
By JOHN DEAN GOSS, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. History of Municipal Land Ownership on Manhattan Island.
By GEORGE ASHTON BLACK, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
4. Financial History of Massachusetts.
By CHARLES H. J. DOUGLAS, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME II, 1892-93. (See note on last page.)

1. [5] The Economics of the Russian Village.
By ISAAC A. HOURWICH, Ph.D. (Out of print).
2. [6] Bankruptcy. A Study in Comparative Legislation.
By SAMUEL W. DUNSCOMB, JR., Ph.D. (Not sold separately).
3. [7] Special Assessments; A Study in Municipal Finance.
By VICTOR ROSEWATER, Ph.D. Second Edition, 1898. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME III, 1893. 465 pp. (See note on last page.)

1. [8] History of Elections in American Colonies.
By CORTLAND F. BISHOP, Ph.D. (Not sold separately).
2. [9] The Commercial Policy of England toward the American Colonies.
By GEORGE L. BEER, A. M. (Out of print).

VOLUME IV, 1893-94. 438 pp. (See note on last page.)

1. [10] Financial History of Virginia.
By WILLIAM Z. RIPLEY, Ph.D. (Not sold separately).
2. [11] The Inheritance Tax. By MAX WEST, Ph.D. Second Edition, 1908. Price $2.00.
3. [12] History of Taxation in Vermont. By FREDERICK A. WOOD, Ph.D. (Out of print).

VOLUME V, 1895-96. 498 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50.

1. [13] Double Taxation in the United States.
By FRANCIS WALKER, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [14] The Separation of Governmental Powers.
By WILLIAM BONDY, LL.B., Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. [15] Municipal Government in Michigan and Ohio.
By DELOS F. WILCOX, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME VI, 1896. 601 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50; Paper covers, $4.00.

- [16] History of Proprietary Government in Pennsylvania.
By WILLIAM ROBERT SHEPHERD, Ph.D.

VOLUME VII, 1896. 512 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50.

1. [17] History of the Transition from Provincial to Commonwealth Government in Massachusetts.
By HARRY A. CUSHING, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [18] Speculation on the Stock and Produce Exchanges of the United States
By HENRY CROSBY EMERY, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME VIII, 1896-98. 551 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [19] The Struggle between President Johnson and Congress over Reconstruction.
By CHARLES ERNEST CHADSEY, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [20] Recent Centralizing Tendencies in State Educational Administration.
By WILLIAM CLARENCE WEBSTER, Ph.D. Price, 75 cents.
3. [21] The Abolition of Privateering and the Declaration of Paris.
By FRANCIS R. STARK, LL.B., Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
4. [22] Public Administration in Massachusetts. The Relation of Central to Local Activity.
By ROBERT HARVEY WHITTEN, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME IX, 1897-98. 617 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [23] English Local Government of To-day. A Study of the Relations of Central and Local Government.
By MILO ROY MALTBIE, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [24] German Wage Theories. A History of their Development.
By JAMES W. CROOK, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. [25] The Centralization of Administration in New York State.
By JOHN ARCHIBALD FAIRLIE, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME X, 1898-99. 409 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50.

1. [26] Sympathetic Strikes and Sympathetic Lockouts.
By FRED S. HALL, Ph.D. Price, $1.00
2. [27] *Rhode Island and the Formation of the Union.
By FRANK GREENE BATES, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
3. [28] Centralized Administration of Liquor Laws in the American Commonwealths.
By CLEMENT MOORE LACHY SITES, Ph.D. Price, $1.00

VOLUME XI, 1899. 495 pp. Price, cloth, 4.00; paper covers, $3.50.

- [29] The Growth of Cities.
By ADNA FERRIN WEBER Ph.D.

VOLUME XII, 1899-1900. 586 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [30] History and Functions of Central Labor Unions.
By WILLIAM MAXWELL BURKE, Ph.D. Price, $1.00
2. [31] Colonial Immigration Laws.
By EDWARD EMERSON PROPER, A.M. Price, 75 cents.
3. [32] History of Military Pension Legislation in the United States.
By WILLIAM HENRY GLASSON, Ph.D. Price, $1.00
4. [33] History of the Theory of Sovereignty since Rousseau.
By CHARLES E. MERRIAM, Jr., Ph.D. Price, $1.50

VOLUME XIII, 1901. 570 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [34] The Legal Property Relations of Married Parties.
By ISIDOR LOBB, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
2. [35] Political Nativism in New York State.
By LOUIS DOW SCISCO, Ph.D. Price, $2.00
3. [36] The Reconstruction of Georgia.
By EDWIN C. WOOLLEY, Ph.D. Price, $1.00

VOLUME XIV, 1901-1902. 576 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [37] Loyalism in New York during the American Revolution.
By ALEXANDER CLARENCE FLICK, Ph.D. Price, $2.00
2. [38] The Economic Theory of Risk and Insurance.
By ALLAN H. WILLETT, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
3. [39] The Eastern Question: A Study in Diplomacy.
By STEPHEN P. H. DUGGAN, Ph.D. Price, $1.00

VOLUME XV, 1902. 427 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50; Paper covers, $3.00.

- [40] Crime in Its Relation to Social Progress. By ARTHUR CLEVELAND HALL, Ph.D.

VOLUME XVI, 1902-1903. 547 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [41] The Past and Present of Commerce in Japan.
By YETARO KINOSITA, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
2. [42] The Employment of Women in the Clothing Trade.
By MABEL HURD WILLET, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
3. [43] The Centralization of Administration in Ohio.
By SAMUEL P. ORTH, Ph.D. Price, $1.50

VOLUME XVII, 1903. 635 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [44] *Centralizing Tendencies in the Administration of Indiana.
By WILLIAM A. RAWLES, Ph.D. Price, $2.50
2. [45] Principles of Justice in Taxation. By STEPHEN F. WESTON, Ph.D. Price, $2.00

VOLUME XVIII, 1903. 753 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [46] The Administration of Iowa. By HAROLD MARTIN BOWMAN, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
2. [47] Turgot and the Six Edicts. By ROBERT P. SHEPHERD, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
3. [48] Hanover and Prussia, 1795-1803. By GUY STANTON FORD, Ph.D. Price, $2.00

VOLUME XIX, 1903-1905. 588 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [49] Josiah Tucker, Economist. By WALTER ERNEST CLARK, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
2. [50] History and Criticism of the Labor Theory of Value in English Political Economy.
By ALBERT C. WHITAKER, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
3. [51] Trade Unions and the Law in New York.
By GEORGE GORHAM GROAT, Ph.D. Price, $1.00

VOLUME XX, 1904. 514 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50.

1. [52] The Office of the Justice of the Peace in England.
By CHARLES AUSTIN BEARD, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
2. [53] A History of Military Government in Newly Acquired Territory of the United States.
By DAVID Y. THOMAS, Ph.D. Price, $2.00

VOLUME XXI, 1904. 746 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [54] *Treaties, their Making and Enforcement.
By SAMUEL B. CRANDALL, Ph.D. Price, $1.50
2. [55] The Sociology of a New York City Block.
By THOMAS JESSE JONES, Ph.D. Price, $1.00
3. [56] Pre-Malthusian Doctrines of Population.
By CHARLES E. STANGELAND, Ph.D. Price, $2.50

VOLUME XXII, 1905. 520 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50; paper covers, $3.00.

- [57] The Historical Development of the Poor Law of Connecticut.
By EDWARD W. CAPEN, Ph. D.

VOLUME XXIII, 1905. 594 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [58] The Economics of Land Tenure in Georgia.
By ENOCH MARVIN BANKS, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [59] Mistake in Contract. A Study in Comparative Jurisprudence.
By EDWIN C. MCKEAG, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. [60] Combination in the Mining Industry.
By HENRY R. MUSSEY, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
4. [61] The English Craft Guilds and the Government.
By STELLA KRAMER, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME XXIV, 1905. 521 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [62] The Place of Magic in the Intellectual History of Europe.
By LYNN THORNDIKE, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [63] The Ecclesiastical Edicts of the Theodosian Code.
By WILLIAM K. BOYD, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. [64] The International Position of Japan as a Great Power.
By SEIJI G. HISHIDA, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME XXV, 1906-07. 600 pp. (Sold only in Sets.)

1. [65] Municipal Control of Public Utilities.
By O. L. POND, Ph.D. (Not sold separately.)
2. [66] The Budget in the American Commonwealths.
By EUGENE E. AGGER, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
3. [67] The Finances of Cleveland.
By CHARLES C. WILLIAMSON, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME XXVI, 1907. 559 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [68] Trade and Currency in Early Oregon.
By JAMES H. GILBERT, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [69] Luther's Table Talk.
By PRESERVED SMITH, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. [70] The Tobacco Industry in the United States.
By MEYER JACOBSTEIN, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
4. [71] Social Democracy and Population.
By ALVAN A. TENNEY, Ph.D. Price, 75 cents.

VOLUME XXVII, 1907. 578 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [72] The Economic Policy of Robert Walpole.
By NORRIS A. BRISCO, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [73] The United States Steel Corporation.
By ABRAHAM BERGLUND, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
3. [74] The Taxation of Corporations in Massachusetts.
By HARRY G. FRIEDMAN, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME XXVIII, 1907. 564 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [75] DeWitt Clinton and the Origin of the Spoils System in New York.
By HOWARD LEE MCBAIN, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [76] The Development of the Legislature of Colonial Virginia.
By ELMER I. MILLER, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
3. [77] The Distribution of Ownership.
By JOSEPH HARDING UNDERWOOD, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME XXIX, 1908. 703 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [78] Early New England Towns.
By ANNE BUSH MACLEAR, Ph.D. Price, $2.50.
2. [79] New Hampshire as a Royal Province.
By WILLIAM H. FRY, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.

VOLUME XXX, 1908. 712 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50; Paper covers, $4.00.

- [80] The Province of New Jersey, 1664-1738.
By EDWIN P. TANNER, Ph.D.

VOLUME XXXI, 1908. 575 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [81] Private Freight Cars and American Railroads.
By L. D. H. WELD, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [82] Ohio before 1850.
By ROBERT E. CHADDOCK, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
3. [83] Consanguineous Marriages in the American Population.
By GEORGE B. LOUIS ARNER, Ph.D. Price, 75 cents.
4. [84] Adolphe Quetelet as Statistician.
By FRANK H. HANKINS, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.

VOLUME XXXII, 1908. 705 pp. Price, cloth, 4.50; paper covers, $4.00.

- 85] The Enforcement of the Statutes of Laborers.
By BERTHA HAVEN PUTNAM, Ph.D.

VOLUME XXXIII, 1908-1909. 635 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [86] Factory Legislation in Maine.
By E. STAGG WHITIN, A.B. Price, $2.00.
2. [87] Psychological Interpretations of Society.
By MICHAEL M. DAVIS, Jr., Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
3. [88] An Introduction to the Sources relating to the Germanic Invasions.
By CARLTON J. H. HAYES, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME XXXIV, 1909. 628 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [89] Transportation and Industrial Development in the Middle West.
By WILLIAM F. GEPHART, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [90] Social Reform and the Reformation.
By JACOB SALWYN SCHAPIRO, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.
3. [91] Responsibility for Crime.
By PHILIP A. PARSONS, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME XXXV, 1909. 568 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [92] The Conflict over the Judicial Powers in the United States to 1870.
By CHARLES GROVE HAINES, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [93] A Study of the Population of Manhattanville.
By HOWARD BROWN WOOLSTON, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.
3. [94] *Divorce: A Study in Social Causation.
By JAMES P. LICHTENBERGER, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME XXXVI, 1910. 542 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [95] *Reconstruction in Texas. By CHARLES WILLIAM RAMSDELL, Ph.D. Price, $2.50.
2. [96] *The Transition in Virginia from Colony to Commonwealth.
By CHARLES RAMSDELL LINGLEY, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME XXXVII, 1910. 806 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [97] Standards of Reasonableness in Local Freight Discriminations.
By JOHN MAURICE CLARK, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.
2. [98] Legal Development in Colonial Massachusetts.
By CHARLES J. HILKEY, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.
3. [99] *Social and Mental Traits of the Negro.
By HOWARD W. ODUM, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME XXXVIII, 1910. 463 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50.

1. [100] The Public Domain and Democracy.
By ROBERT TUDOR HILL, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [101] Organismic Theories of the State.
By FRANCIS W. COKER, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME XXXIX, 1910-1911. 651 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [102] The Making of the Balkan States.
By WILLIAM SMITH MURRAY, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [103] Political History of New York State during the Period of the Civil War.
By SIDNEY DAVID BRUMMER, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.

VOLUME XL, 1911. 633 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [104] A Survey of Constitutional Development in China.
By HAWKING L. YEN, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [105] Ohio Politics during the Civil War Period.
By GEORGE H. PORTER, Ph.D. Price, $1.75.
3. [106] The Territorial Basis of Government under the State Constitutions.
By ALFRED ZANTZINGER REED, Ph.D. Price, $1.75.

VOLUME XLI, 1911. 514 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50; paper covers, $3.00.

- [107] New Jersey as a Royal Province. By EDGAR JACOB FISHER, Ph.D.

VOLUME XLII, 1911. 400 pp. Price, cloth, $3.00; paper covers, $2.50.

- [108] Attitude of American Courts in Labor Cases.
By GEORGE GORHAM Groat, Ph.D.

VOLUME XLIII, 1911. 633 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [109] *Industrial Causes of Congestion of Population in New York City.
By EDWARD EWING PRATT, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [110] Education and the Mores.
By F. STUART CHAPIN, Ph.D. Price, 75 cents.
3. [111] The British Consuls in the Confederacy.
By MILLEDGE L. BONHAM, JR., Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUMES XLIV and XLV, 1911. 745 pp.

Price for the two volumes, cloth, $6.00; paper covers, $5.00.

- [112 and 113] The Economic Principles of Confucius and his School.
By CHEN HUAN-CHANG, Ph.D.

VOLUME XLVI, 1911-1912. 623 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [114] The Ricardian Socialists.
By ESTHER LOWENTHAL, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [115] Ibrahim Pasha, Grand Vizier of Suleiman, the Magnificent.
By HESTER DONALDSON JENKINS, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. [116] *Syndicalism in France.
By LOUIS LEVINE, Ph.D. Second edition, 1914. Price, $1.50.
4. [117] A Hoosier Village.
By NEWELL LEROY SIMS, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME XLVII, 1912. 544 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [118] The Politics of Michigan, 1865-1878, By HARRIETTE M. DILLA, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [119] *The United States Beet Sugar Industry and the Tariff. By ROY G. BLAKEY, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME XLVIII, 1912. 493 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [120] Isidor of Seville. By ERNEST BREHAUT, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [121] Progress and Uniformity in Child-Labor Legislation. By WILLIAM FIELDING OGBURN, Ph.D. Price, $1.75.

VOLUME XLIX, 1912. 592 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [122] British Radicalism 1791-1797. By WALTER PHELPS HALL. Price, $2.00.
2. [123] A Comparative Study of the Law of Corporations. By ARTHUR K. KUHN, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
3. [124] *The Negro at Work in New York City. By GEORGE E. HAYNES, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.

VOLUME L, 1911. 481 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [125] *The Spirit of Chinese Philanthropy. By YAI YUE TSU, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [126] *The Alien in China. By VI. KYUIN WELLINGTON KOO, Ph.D. Price, $2.50.

VOLUME LI, 1912. 4to. Atlas. Price: cloth, $1.50; paper covers, $1.00.

1. [127] The Sale of Liquor in the South. By LEONARD S. BLAKEY, Ph.D.

VOLUME LII, 1912. 489 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [128] *Provincial and Local Taxation in Canada. By SOLOMON VINERBERG, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [129] *The Distribution of Income. By FRANK HATCH STREIGHTOFF, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
3. [130] *The Finances of Vermont. By FREDERICK A. WOOD, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME LIII, 1913. 789 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50; paper, $4.00.

- [131] The Civil War and Reconstruction in Florida. By W. W. DAVIS, Ph.D.

VOLUME LIV, 1913. 604 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [132] *Privileges and Immunities of Citizens of the United States. By ARNOLD JOHNSON LIEN, Ph.D. Price, 75 cents.
2. [133] The Supreme Court and Unconstitutional Legislation. By BLAINE FREE MOORE, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. [134] *Indian Slavery in Colonial Times within the Present Limits of the United States. By ALMON WHEELER LAUBER, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.

VOLUME LV, 1913. 665 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [135] *A Political History of the State of New York. By HOMER A. STEEBINS, Ph.D. Price, $4.00.
2. [136] *The Early Persecutions of the Christians. By LEON H. CANFIELD, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME LVI, 1913. 406 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50.

1. [137] Speculation on the New York Stock Exchange, 1904-1907. By ALGERNON ASHBURNER OSBORNE. Price, $1.50.
2. [138] The Policy of the United States towards Industrial Monopoly. By OSWALD WHITMAN KNAUTH, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME LVII, 1914. 670 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [139] *The Civil Service of Great Britain. By ROBERT MOSES, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [140] The Financial History of New York State. By DON C. SOWERS. Price, $2.50.

VOLUME LVIII, 1914. 684 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50; paper, $4.00.

- [141] Reconstruction in North Carolina. By J. G. DE ROULNAC HAMILTON, Ph.D.

VOLUME LIX, 1914. 625 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [142] The Development of Modern Turkey by means of its Press. By AHMED EMIN, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
2. [143] The System of Taxation in China, 1614-1911. By SHAO-KWAN CHEN, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.
3. [144] The Currency Problem in China. By WEN PIN WEI, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.
4. [145] *Jewish Immigration to the United States. By SAMUEL JOSEPH, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME LX. 1914. 516 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [146] *Constantino the Great and Christianity.
By CHRISTOPHER BUSH COLEMAN, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [147] The Establishment of Christianity and the Proscription of Paganism.
By MAUD ALINE HUTTMAN, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME LXI. 1914. 496 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [148] *The Railway Conductors: A Study in Organized Labor.
By EDWIN CLYDE ROBBINS. Price, $1.50.
2. [149] *The Finances of the City of New York.
By YIN-CH'U MA, Ph.D. Price, $2.50.

VOLUME LXII. 1914. 414 pp. Price, cloth, $3.50.

- [150] The Journal of the Joint Committee of Fifteen on Reconstruction.
39th Congress, 1865-1867. By BENJAMIN B. KENDRICK, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.

VOLUME LXIII. 1914. 561 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [151] Emile Durkheim's Contributions to Sociological Theory.
By CHARLES ELMER GEHLKE, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [152] The Nationalization of Railways in Japan.
By TOSHIHARU WATARAI, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.
3. [153] Population: A Study in Malthusianism.
By WARREN S. THOMPSON, Ph.D. Price, $1.75.

VOLUME LXIV. 1915. 646 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [154] *Reconstruction in Georgia.
By C. MILDRED THOMPSON, Ph.D. Price, 3.00.
2. [155] *The Review of American Colonial Legislation by the King in Council.
By ELMER BEECHER RUSSELL, Ph.D. Price, $1.75.

VOLUME LXV. 1915. 524 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [156] *The Sovereign Council of New France.
By RAYMOND DU BOIS CANALL, Ph.D. Price, $2.25.
2. [157] *Scientific Management (2nd. ed. 1918).
By HORACE B. DRURY, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME LXVI. 1915. 655 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [158] *The Recognition Policy of the United States.
By JULIUS GOEBEL, JR., Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [159] Railway Problems in China.
By CHIH HSU, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
3. [160] *The Boxer Rebellion.
By PAUL H. CLEMENTS, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME LXVII. 1916. 538 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [161] *Russian Sociology.
By JULIUS F. HECKER, Ph.D. Price, $2.50.
2. [162] State Regulation of Railroads in the South.
By MAXWELL FERGUSON, A. M., LL.B. Price, $1.75.

VOLUME LXVIII. 1916. 518 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

- [163] The Origins of the Islamic State. By PHILIP K. HITTI, Ph.D. Price, $4.00.

VOLUME LXIX. 1916. 489 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [164] Railway Monopoly and Rate Regulation.
By ROBERT J. MCFALL, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [165] The Butter Industry in the United States.
By EDWARD WIEST, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME LXX. 1916. 540 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

- [166] Mohammedan Theories of Finance.
By NICOLAS P. AGHNIDES, Ph.D. Price, $4.00.

VOLUME LXXI. 1916. 476 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [167] The Commerce of Louisiana during the French Regime, 1699-1763.
By N. M. MILLER SURREY, Ph.D. Price, $3.50.

VOLUME LXXII. 1916. 542 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [168] American Men of Letters: Their Nature and Nurture.
By EDWIN LEAVITT CLARKE, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [169] The Tariff Problem in China.
By CHIN CHU, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
3. [170] The Marketing of Perishable Food Products.
By A. B. ADAMS, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME LXXIII. 1917. 616 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [171] *The Social and Economic Aspects of the Chartist Movement.
By FRANK F. ROSENBLATT, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [172] *The Decline of the Chartist Movement.
By PRISTON WILLIAM SLOSSON, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
3. [173] Chartism and the Churches.
By H. U. FAULKNER, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.

VOLUME LXXIV. 1917. 546 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [174] The Rise of Ecclesiastical Control in Quebec.
By WALTER A. RIDDELL, Ph.D. Price, $1.75.
2. [175] Political Opinion in Massachusetts during the Civil War and Reconstruction.
By EDITH ELLEN WARE, Ph.D. Price, $1.75.
3. [176] Collective Bargaining in the Lithographic Industry.
By H. E. HOAGLAND, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME LXXV. 1917. 410 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

- An extra-illustrated and bound volume is published at $5.00.
1. [177] New York as an Eighteenth Century Municipality. Prior to 1731.
By ARTHUR EVERRETT PETERSON, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
 2. [178] New York as an Eighteenth Century Municipality. 1731-1776.
By GEORGE WILLIAM EDWARDS, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.

VOLUME LXXVI. 1917. 489 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [179] *Economic and Social History of Chowan County, North Carolina.
By W. SCOTT BOYCE, Ph.D. Price, $2.50.
2. [180] Separation of State and Local Revenues in the United States.
By MABEL NEWCOMER, Ph.D. Price, $1.75.

VOLUME LXXVII. 1917. 473 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

- [181] American Civil Church Law.
By CARL ZOLLMANN, LL.B. Price, $3.50.

VOLUME LXXVIII. 1917. 647 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

- [182] The Colonial Merchants and the American Revolution.
By ARTHUR MEIER SCHLESINGER, Ph.D. Price, $4.00.

VOLUME LXXIX. 1917-1918. 535 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [183] Contemporary Theories of Unemployment and Unemployment Relief.
By FREDERICK C. MILLS, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [184] The French Assembly of 1848 and American Constitutional Doctrine.
By EUGENE NEWTON CURTIS, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.

VOLUME LXXX. 1918. 448 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [185] *Valuation and Rate Making.
By ROBERT L. HALB, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [186] The Enclosure of Open Fields in England.
By HARRIET BRADLEY, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.
3. [187] The Land Tax in China.
By H. L. HUANG, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME LXXXI. 1918. 601 pp. Price, cloth $4.50.

1. [188] Social Life in Rome in the Time of Plautus and Terence.
By GEORGIA W. LEFFINGWELL, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.
2. [189] *Australian Social Development.
By CLARENCE H. NORTHCOTT, Ph.D. Price, $2.50.
3. [190] *Factory Statistics and Industrial Fatigue.
By PHILIP S. FLORENCE, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.

VOLUME LXXXII. 1918-1919. 576 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [191] New England and the Bavarian Illuminati.
By VERNON STAUFFER, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.
2. [192] Resale Price Maintenance.
By CLAUDIUS T. MURCHISON, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME LXXXIII. 1919. 432 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

- [193] The I. W. W.
By PAUL F. BRISSENDEN, Ph.D. Price, $3.50.

VOLUME LXXXIV. 1919. 534 pp. Price, cloth, $4.50.

1. [194] The Royal Government in Virginia, 1624-1775.
By PERCY SCOTT FLIPPIN, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.
2. [195] Hellenic Conceptions of Peace.
By WALLACE E. CALDWELL, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.

VOLUME LXXXV. 1919. 450 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [196] The Religious Policy of the Bavarian Government during the Napoleonic Period.
By CHESTER P. HIGBY, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.
2. [197] Public Debts of China.
By F. H. HUANG, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME LXXXVI. 1919. 460 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

- [198] The Decline of Aristocracy in the Politics of New York.
By DIXON RYAN FOX, Ph.D. Price, $3.50.

VOLUME LXXXVII. 1919. 451 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

- [199] Foreign Trade of China.
By CHONG SU SEE, Ph.D. Price, $3.50.

VOLUME LXXXVIII. 1919. 444 pp. Price, cloth, $4.00.

1. [200] The Street Surface Railway Franchises of New York City.
By HARRY J. CARMAN, Ph.D. Price, $2.00.
2. [201] Electric Light Franchises in New York City.
By LEONORA ARENT, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.

VOLUME LXXXIX. 1919. 558 pp. Price, cloth, $5.00.

1. [202] Women's Wages. By EMILIE J. HUTCHINSON, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [203] The Return of the Democratic Party to Power in 1884.
By HARRISON COOK THOMAS, Ph.D. Price, $2.25.
3. [204] The Paris Bourse and French Finance.
By WILLIAM PARKER, Ph.D. Price, $1.00.

VOLUME XC. 1920. 547 pp. Price, cloth, $5.25.

1. [205] Prison Methods in New York State. By PHILIP KLEIN, Ph.D. Price, $3.50.
2. [206] India's Demand for Transportation.
By WILLIAM E. WELD, Ph.D. Price, $1.25.

VOLUME XCI. 1920. 626 pp. Price, cloth, $6.25.

1. [207] The Influence of Oversea Expansion on England to 1700.*
By JAMES E. GILLESPIE, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.
2. [208] International Labor Legislation. By I. F. AYUSAWA, Ph.D. Price, $2.75.

VOLUME XCII. 1920. 433 pp. Price, cloth, $5.00.

- [209] The Public Life of William Shirley. By GEORGE A. WOOD, Ph.D. Price, $4.50.

VOLUME XCIII. 1920.

1. [210] The English Reform Bill of 1867.* By JOSEPH H. PARK, Ph.D. Price, $3.00.
2. [211] The Policy of the United States as Regards Intervention.
By CHARLES E. MARTIN. (In press).

VOLUME XCIV. 1920.

1. [212] Catastrophe and Social Change.* By S. H. PRINCE, Ph.D. Price, $1.50.
2. [213] Intermarriage in New York City. By JULIUS DRACHSLER. Price, $2.25.
3. [214] The Ratification of the Federal Constitution by the State of New York.
By C. E. MINER. (In press).

VOLUME XCV. 1920.

1. [215] Railroad Capitalization.* By JAMES C. BONERIGHT. Price, $2.00.
2. [216] American Apprenticeship and Industrial Education.
By PAUL H. DOUGLAS. (In press).

VOLUME XCVI. 1920.

1. [217] Parliamentary Franchise Reform in England from 1885 to 1918.
By HOMER L. MORRIS. (In press).
2. [218] The Working Forces in Japanese Politics. By UICHI IWASAKI. (In press).

*The price for each separate monograph is for paper-covered copies; separate monographs marked , can be supplied bound in cloth, for 75c. additional. All prices are net.

The set of ninety-two volumes, covering monographs 1-209, is offered, bound, for $320; except that Volumes II, III, IV, and VII can be supplied only in part. Volume II No. 1, Volume III No. 2, Volume IV No. 3, and Volume VII No. 2, being out of print. Volumes II, III, and IV, as described in the last sentence, and Volume XXV can now be supplied only in connection with complete sets, but the separate monographs of each of these volumes are available unless marked "not sold separately"

For further information, apply to Messrs. LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 443 Fourth Avenue, New York.

London: P. S. KING & SON, Ltd., Orchard House, Westminster.

THIS BOOK IS DUE ON THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW

AN INITIAL FINE OF 25 CENTS

WILL BE ASSESSED FOR FAILURE TO RETURN
THIS BOOK ON THE DATE DUE. THE PENALTY
WILL INCREASE TO 50 CENTS ON THE SEVENTH DAY
AND TO $1.00 ON THE SIXTEENTH DAY OVERDUE.

OCT 17 1932

OCT 18 1933

OCT 19 1933

FEB 25 1935

REC. CIR. OCT 16 78

MAR 25 1938
REC. CIR. OCT 16 78

MAR 9 1940

REC. CIR. OCT 16 78

JAN 18 1944

MAR 15 1944

29 APR 1961

REC'D LD

APR 15 1961

REC. CIR. OCT 16 78

MAR 11 1964 M E

REC'D LD

JUL 11 1964 - 9 AM

MAR 5 1964

RECEIVED

MAR 4 1967 - 4 PM

LOAN DEPT.

OCT 22 1968 3 1

RECEIVED

NOV 25 1968 - 8 PM

LOAN DEPT.

LD 21-100m

[illegible]

443471

H31

C7

V. 93

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY

